"They have tried to get away from commemorating the day of his death and try to celebrate the day of his birth," said Melody Miller, and aide to Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass. The senator and other family members will not grant interviews.

Some family members likely will follow the tradition and quietly visit JFK's grave site at the Arlington National Cemetery, while others join family matriarch Rose Kennedy at her regular daily Mass at the Kennedy compound in Hyannisport, Mass., said Ms. Miller, a long-time Kennedy aide who worked for the late Robert F. Kennedy.

Despite the family's low profile, there are a series of events scheduled around the country to remember the 35th president, his spirit and the events surrounding Nov. 22, 1963. In Washington, 500 original members of the Kennedy-created Peace Corps will hold a 24 hour vigil in the rotunda of the Capital, said Dennis Grubb, a Manhattan investment banker and former Kennedy advance man who went to Colombia in 1961 with the first wave of corps volunteers.

Grubb said each former volunteer will read brief eulogies, many written in Peace Corps diaries during the hours and days following the assassination.

After the vigil, a memorial service will be held at St. Matthew's Cathedral with Sargent Shriver, who was JFK's brother-in-law and the first Peace Corps director, and Bill Moyers, the television journalist who was an assistant corps director.

Across the river, the US Army Special Forces (Green Berets) will conduct their traditional Nov. 22 wreath-laying ceremony at the Kennedy grave site. But cemetery history Tom Sherlock said starting next, the Green Berets will follow the family's lead and hold the ceremony on JFK's birthday, May 29.

On Nov. 20, surviving members of Kennedy's 50-officer class, which received its PT boat training in Rhode Island will hold a service at the cemetery and their own wreath ceremony.

"We kept our friendships up all through the years," said Fred Rosen, a business consultant in Dalton, GA., and former Navy lieutenant commander who is organizing the event. "It's our own class reunion."

In Boston, 25 roses will be displayed near the entrance of the Kennedy Library and admission will be free for visitors that day. There also will be a special program for high school students "who have no memory of President Kennedy and the impact of his death on the world," said library spokesman Frank Rigg.

"That day is usually a quiet one here," Rigg said. "It's more a day of quiet reflection and meditation."

"I usually go to church, light a candle and have a drink," said David F. Powers, one of JFK's closest associates who is the library's curator.

In Dallas, preparations continued for a museum at the Texas School Book Depository where assassin Lee Harvey Oswald gunned down Kennedy as the presidential motorcade rode through Dealey Plaza. The museum will not be ready until next year.

In Pennsylvania, scholars and researchers who have devoted much of the past quarter century to investigating the Kennedy assassination will gather at the University of Pittsburgh for a series of seminars.

But the television is likely to dominate the anniversay-related activities.

In addition to a string of local JFK specials, CBS, NBC and PBS all are planning extensive prime-time features on the assassination.

CBS News will air a two-hour special Nov. 17, anchored by Dan Rather, that will show highlights of the network's original 53 hours of live coverage.

Smith dedicates new croquet court

By NANCY KLINGENER
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — The country's first collegiate croquet court was dedicated at Smith College this weekend, bringing competitive croquet to the Five College area.

The court was built entirely from donations for that purpose, and one goal behind its construction was to popularize the game most people think of as backyard recreation.

"This is a game in terms of skills that is closer to pool than to the backyard game," said Professor Emeritus Richard B. Young, who started the team at Smith College three years ago. "In terms of tactics and strategy, it's closer to chess."

Regulation croquet has nine wickets, as opposed to six in the backyard game. The object of the game is to chase an opponent's ball twice through the nine wickets, and then hit the finishing stake first.

Kate Schwartz, president of the Smith team, said the court will be open to Five College players. Yesterday, she and her teammates were competing against players from Colby, Brown and Williams colleges.

"It's a way to compete against members of the opposite sex on an equal level," she said. "To have so much fun and be making a statement at the same time is great."

Young called croquet "the perfect affirmative action sport," because, he said, "it tends to be age and gender neutral."

Schwartz said she also appreciates the relaxed nature of the competition.

"You don't have to be in impeccable shape to play it," she said. "It's a way to be competitive and meet people without running around. It's a different kind of sport. It's a mind sport."

The Richard B. Young Croquet Court is a square of natural turf, 105 by 84 feet, between the tennis courts and a riding ring at the women's college.

A croquet court must "have the surface of a putting green, but flat as a pool table," Young said.

When news of the croquet court broke last year, Smith College found itself facing charges of elitism, based on the traditional upper-class appeal of the sport.

"If you play croquet at Palm Beach, I suppose it's an elitist sport," Young said. "So is tennis. So is golf. But on a collegiate level, they're playing in shorts and drinking beer."

Young pointed out other sports, like riding horses, cost their competitors more cash than croquet.

"Compared to a set of good golf clubs, it's a poor man's sport," he said.

Hearing addresses SGA actions

By GEORGE FRANCY
Collegian Staff

In an unusual and possibly illegal meeting last night, a tribunal of justices heard testimony against the Student Government Association Coordinating Committee's summer move to install Shari Silkoff and Jason Rabinowitz as SGA presidents.

The committee, which SGA Speaker Robert Fadel said acts for the full senate when it is not in session, installed Silkoff and Rabinowitz in June. Fadel said this was done because at the time the SGA needed presidents.

"In the end it boiled down to an emergency, we needed presidents," Fadel said.

SGA Senator Mary Rita Kropp requested the judicial review because she feels the action of the Coordinating Committee to install Silkoff/Rabinowitz was in violation of a restraining order issued by the Student Judiciary on May 11.

Kropp said the way Silkoff and Rabinowitz were installed was underhanded. "This was a secret kind of vote to pass the motion without the full senate in session.

"The Coordinating Committee violated the restraining order and by doing that they directly violated the constitution," Kropp said. Asked why she had decided to bring the case up, Kropp replied, "Frankly, I'm surprised no one did it before me."

Student Trustee Stephanie Orefice, as co-respondent for the Coordinating Committee with Fadel, submitted three motions to dismiss and three motions to postpone the hearing.

One of Orefice's complaints was that the hearing was being held on a Sunday night, which is in violation of Massachusetts General Law. However, since the SGA and its branches, in this case the judiciary, may not be a governmental body as defined by the state, they may not have to abide by the law.

Orefice also said since she was given the subpoena for the hearing after 5 p.m. Friday, she was not given enough time to gather evidence for a defense.

"I'm not trying to give you a hard time," Orefice said

Low turnout at rally for Ferrer disappoints its organizers

BY SARA GALER
Collegian Staff

A small crowd turned out for a rally held Friday on the Student Union steps in memory of Virginia Ferrer and other battered women.

Rally organizers Taciana Giambrone and Jean Wallace shared the podium with two other women as they read poetry, spoke about Virginia Ferrer, the legal system, and the abuse of women.

"It's very sad that there are so few people stopping to listen when we're trying to raise consciousness about such an important issue," said Giambrone, who works with Necessities/Necidades, a Northampton shelter for battered women and their children. "We can mobilize 2000 people to protest the alcohol policy, but when it's time to talk about real issues we cannot stop for five minutes."

"Virginia Ferrer was stabbed by her batterer on September 9," said Giambrone. "This rally is not only in her memory, but also in memory of other women who lived their lives in fear of battering and abuse."

Giambrone explained the cycle of violence, using a chart which demonstrated a common pattern of abuse, and explaining some of the misconceptions surrounding the lives of abusers and their victims.

"Virginia is a tragic example of the lengths women must go to for their health and safety. She did everything she was supposed to do for help. The Department of Social Services supported family counseling which required her to remain in contact with her batterer," said Giambrone.

Pamphlets about abuse were available at the podium. Wallace, who works with the Valley Women's Voice, said organizations such as the Everywoman's Center and Necessities/Necesidades were places a victim could call for help.

"If you are being battered or hit, or psychologically abused, get help. The first thing you should do is call the police. They will help you," Wallace said.

Case decision rendered

McDevitt guilty of campaign rule violations

By YANA DLUGY
Collegian Staff

The Student Supreme Court has made available a decision in which it found a defendant guilty of violating campaign rules during the Student Trustee election last semester.

The decision was released May 13 but not made available to the Collegian until late last week.

In the appellate proceeding, the court found Bob McDevitt, one of the candidates in the trustee race, guilty of violating a Student Government Association constitutional bylaw.

The bylaw states, "No candidate or campaign worker shall remove another candidate's campaign material."

However, the court denied the petitioner Sandy Edwards, another candidate in the election, a request for a new trustee election.

Instead the court recommended a public discourse of the incident and a judicial censure. One of the interpretations for judicial censure is official condemnation or reprimand.

The original complaint stemmed from a March 4 incident in the Student Union Craft Center. Edwards alleged McDevitt took her campaign materials without her permission. Among the materials were designs for campaign buttons.

The court found McDevitt not guilty based on the prosecution's failure to prove McDevitt did in fact take Edwards' campaign materials and had no intention of returning the materials to Edwards.

Edwards then filed an appeal on the grounds that McDevitt's possession of her campaign materials was a violation of an SGA bylaw.

The appeal was granted, and the appellate court reversed the decision based on the fact McDevitt never disputed being in posession of the material and intent was not mentioned in the bylaw.

Absence of attorney general shifts responsibilities to SGA leaders

By ERIN ABBEY
Collegian Staff

Until a new attorney general takes over, other Student Government Association leaders will be sharing the workload of the Student Attorney General's office.

The office has not been filled because the president's office forms a search committee to select the attorney general and the co-presidents-elect have not yet been approved by the senate.

"Even without the attorney general things have run smoothly because there's been an extra burden taken on by the other officers," Co-president-elect Jason Rabinowitz said.

Among the duties of the attorney general is to keep the SGA bylaws and constitution accurate and up-to-date, and to publish revised versions. The speaker of the senate keeps them on file and available. The bylaws are the rules under which the SGA operates.

Before former attorney general Bill Collins took over, attorney generals slacked in maintaining the bylaws, Collins said. The bylaws required sorting out when he took the position last fall, he said.

Members of the coordinating committee, which acts as the senate during the summer and until the senate reconvenes, have taken over the duty of reviewing the bylaws, Speaker of the Senate Robert Fadel said.

As to whether confusion arises from this sorting process, Fadel said, "Most certainly everyone knows what the rules are; it's just a matter of putting them together."

The bylaws have been bound into one book and distributed to officers and committee chairpersons, Fadel said. After they check the accuracy of the included bylaws, and the up-to-date revisions, the bylaws will be distributed to the senators.

"This is something that has been neglected to be done for years. It's a bit of a tedious task because nobody has kept up with it. It's a time-consuming thing," Fadel said.

SGA senate elections are scheduled for Oct. 11. Fadel said he hopes to have the bylaws ready for all the senators the next day.

The absence of an attorney general has caused others to assume the role of prosecuting for the SGA.

Rabinowitz said the attorney general would have helped solve the problem surrounding former Budgets Chairman Gil Penchina, who claims he used student money for personal use to test the system. Instead, the treasurer had to try to get the money back, Rabinowitz said.

Rabinowitz and co-president-elect Shari Silkoff hope to select an attorney general by early October, he said.

Anti-Palestinian remarks found written on posters

Several posters were found with anti-Palestinian remarks scrawled on them Friday by students who claim this is another manifestation of racism at the University of Massachusetts.

The posters advertise a series of seminars titled "The Palestinian-Israeli Conflict, Realities and Alternatives." The seminars are being held at Hampshire College and will be conducted by experts on the subject.

"Never again. Since the war of independence there are no Palestinians, only Arabs and Jews. All Arabs out of Israel!" are the comments written on the posters and flyers. The posters are signed "JDL," apparently meaning Jewish Defense League.

The student, who found the posters identified himself only as Ian K. because of fear of retaliation. He found the defaced posters on the bulletin boards in front of the Campus Center Coffee Shop.

"I feel that the whole University community would be outraged at this. If we let this thing go without public attention this can develop into a violent racist incident similar to the ones that took place before," Ian said. He added that he was a member of the Palestinian Solidarity Committee, a national group that tries to raise money for Palestinian refugees in the middle east.

Steven Duplissea, chairperson of the Organization for Marxist Studies at UMass, was also outraged when he found the posters. Duplissea said he saw a man writing on the posters at 7:45 a.m. Friday and questioned the man.

Duplissea said he had contacted the UMass Police about the incident. Lt. Mike Grabiec would not comment on the situation except to say it was under investigation.

Duplissea said of the comments on the posters: "This is the denunciation of a people, and that's racism."

Edwards said she is satisfied with the decision for which she has waited so long.

"I want people to know that they can't get away with this [type of action]," she said. "Hopefully this incident will open doors for people who want to run for public office and want to get involved. People can run for student government and not have to deal with this."

McDevitt could not be reached for comment.

Cadet may need liver transplant

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — A police cadet stricken by apparent dehydration and exhaustion last week remained in a coma Sunday, and doctors said his survival could depend on a liver transplant.

Timothy Shepard, 25, the Pittsfield police trainee hospitalized at Springfield's Baystate Medical Center since last Monday, is the most seriously ill of 16 cadets who were hospitalized. Nine remain in various western Massachusetts hospitals, and three are on kidney dialysis machines.

Medical investigators say dehydration and exhaustion from intense exercise, rather than contaminated drinking water, were the likely causes of the maladies at the state-run police academy in Agawam.

The cadets were suffering from abdominal pains, dark urine and other symptoms. Some of them fell ill last Monday, and more were stricken Tuesday and Wednesday.

A fund to help pay some of Shepard's medical costs has been started at the Berkshire Savings Bank, The Berkshire Eagle reported Sunday.

Arrangements are being made to transfer Shepard to the Presbyterian Hospital in Pittsburgh.

Shepard collapsed at Monday's training session, which occurred on a hot, humid day and involved strenuous exercise. He has been listed in critical condition since then.

As of yesterday, two cadets had been released after several days in hospitals, and a third was being considered for release.

Pittsfield Mayor Anne Everest Wojkowski and North Adams Mayor John Barrett III have called for a state investigation of the police training program.

In addition to the 16 who were hospitalized, another 33 cadets in the Agawam class were called into Baystate Medical Center for testing on Friday. The last of them were released Saturday.

Joseph Bradley, public relations director of the hospital, said the three cadets on dialysis machines at Baystate were in good to fair condition.

Two investigators said they believed overexercise and a lack of water caused the illnesses.

Harvard tries to ensure free speech

CAMBRIDGE (AP) — Harvard Law School has adopted guidelines designed to ensure free speech after an incident last year when a protestor prevented former Contra leader Adolfo Calero from speaking.

Under the rules, speakers must respond to questions from the audience and abide by the decisions of a moderator. Disruptive demonstrators can be ejected.

The guidelines were created by a committee formed by law school officials after Tufts University student Joshua Laub charged and yelled epithets at Calero when he was speaking at Harvard last October.

After Laub was arrested and the speech was canceled Harvard's ability to serve as a forum for free speech came under question.

"It seems to have achieved what a year ago would have been perceived to be difficult," said Richard Parker, a law professor and member of the committee. "Protest is allowed, but within limits."

Committee members say the guidelines attempt to find a middle ground between allowing speakers to present their message and permitting protestors the right to dissent. Law professor and committee member Alan Dershowitz said the nine-member committee, composed of administrators, faculty and students, strived to be sensitive to giving audience members free speech.

Army labs change military food

Tabasco sauce now a required condiment

NATICK (AP) — There's no such thing as a "mess hall" in today's military; it's been renamed an "enlisted dining facility." And the "C-ration," is no more, replaced by the less lyrical sounding "MRE," short for "meal ready to eat."

These changes, and others, have been orchestrated by the US Army's Research and Development Laboratories here, headquarters for the development of food for all US armed forces.

Among the revelations: For the first time, the military has developed an all-natural bread with a shelf life of three years, and tobasco sauce is now a required condiment for every fighting man.

Spread out on the 78-acre base about 20 miles south of Boston, army scientists and engineers develop food, clothing, and shelter and airdrop equipment in the labs. But much attention is paid to the continually evolving menus planned for soldiers, or what scientists call "future feeding concepts."

Most of the food is what civilians might call take-out. The majority is designed for soldiers in combat and must last for three years. C-rations, designed during World War II, were finally discontinued after the Vietnam War.

"The conception of now was needs to be fought changes and when the military rethinks how it's going to fight, we need to rethink food," said Phil Brandler, acting director of food engineering at the base.

MREs replaced C-rations in 1981. The heavier canned items that were part of the infamous C-rations were dropped in favor of lightweight "meal in a pouch," much of which can be reconstituted in the field.

Some of the changes in how the military is fed stem from logistical differences that have occurred over the years.

"The modern battlefield is more mobile, it makes (the men) harder to find and get to and they go off for days at a time," said Brandler. "They have to be provided with foodstuffs of low volume that can be carried around for awhile."

But the army chefs are mindful that soldiers ought to like what they eat, or at least tolerate it.

"Tastes change," said Brandler. "Food that we developed for the Korean and Vietnam war no longer is acceptable."

Part of that, according to Brandler, is that the ethnic makeup of enlisted men has also changed over the years.

"We have a higher percentage of Vietnamese and Orientals," he said. "Our troops want spicier foods." Hence the tiny bottles of tabasco sauce that surface in each MRE.

Current military field fare is periodically tried out on its consumers in what is called "acceptance testing." "Loss of acceptance" is the term given those food items scorned by soldiers, according to Army food specialist Sue Gagner.

Among the food that's been dropped: lima beans, three-bean salad and fruitcake. Beef stew is on the way out. After soldiers complained that omelettes were too "dense," they were promptly "reformulated."

"We don't want any surprises out there for out troops," said Gagner.

Much of the food research and menu planning is carrried out in giant test kitchens on the base.

Fortunately the soldiers, military fare has been improved upon since the first of Army rations was established by Congress in 1775.

These days, soldiers receive daily rations that approach 4,000 calories. Along with one of 12 different entree like chicken a la king and tuna with noodles, soldiers are allotted crackers with cheese spread, freeze-dried fruit, candy, cookies or cake.

Report: MBTA will need more state money

BOSTON (AP) — An internal report on the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority says the state's financial support for the agency will have to increase from $289 million this year to nearly $1 billion by 2001.

The report also says that the percentage contributed by the 78 cities and towns using the T's services will decline while other towns across the state will bear greater share of costs, according to the Boston Sunday Globe.

Funding methods for the authority were criticized by one state lawmaker, but a top agency official said the figures would be kept in context.

MBTA General Manager James F. O'Leary said the state's subsidy to the authority will continue to rise as a proportion of the state budget from 3 percent to 3.5 percent over the next 12 years.

The report does not take into account sources that could reduce state costs such as fare increases or real estate revenues, O'Leary said.

The study by Lewis Bailey Associates is an effort to analyze the cost of three different ways of funding the MBTA. The current system allows the T to bill the state after the fact for expenditures made as much as 18 months earlier.

The joys (and horrors) of being a first-year student

Dare to go where 26,000 have gone before?
"Beam me down Scottie."

When I landed, all I heard was the theme of Star Trek. It was like nothing I'd seen before. Masses upon masses of people, wearing blank faces scurried about and carried boxes, trunks, refridgerators, toaster ovens, blenders, hot pots, stereos, and endless rows of suitcases.

Aime Finkelstein

Hundreds and thousands of feet of green, rolling terrain was before me. The promised land? The land of opportunity?

They say not to bring Grandma and the family dog. They say to bring an extra pair of sneakers because when it rains, it gets very muddy. They say not the pronounce the "h" in Amherst. No more "boys and girls;" now we're men and women.

There's a few little things they forgot to say.

They forgot to give me glue to paste my smile on my face no matter how homesick I may be. Didn't say to bring band-aids for the blisters one can get from walking so much, that you'll gain 15 pounds in the first semester, or that it may be difficult fitting in.

No one said that standing in endless lines would become a ritual or that the course Oscar forgot to spit out on my schedule was closed. No one said that even with waiting in one line for three and a half hours and having six course selections prepared, I'd still end up with only 12 credits. I never thought that people would say that I talk funny. I never knew that New Yorkers think we're the foreigners. I never realized how hard it is for some people to say Peabody.

"Pea - body?"
"No. Peabody. It's one word."
"Where's Peabody?"
"Twenty minutes north of Boston."
"What's it near?"
"Salem. Where the witches are."
"Where?"
"Never mind."

Who knew that Peter Pan was the transit system, and not a fairy tale? Since when do we call professors and t.a.'s by their first names? Did I ever think I'd make friends with the DECmate wordprocessor?

On my first trip to the tower library a fellow student asked me what floor was good to study on. Do I look like I know?

Now I have to remind myself to sleep and eat, though I really should've left my tastebuds at home with Grandma and the family dog. Mom won't be around to find my favorite pair of dungarees; nor will she make my bed, make chicken soup when I'm sick, sew holes in my socks, and sport a ten here and a twenty there.

This is the real world where checkbooks and green machine cards prevail; where sleep is foreign and dark circles under the eyes get clearer and clearer every day.

So what if I leave here someday speaking like a Long Islander, instead of 'pahking my cah in Havarhd Yad?" Maybe I'll even learn to like the Greatful Dead and Campbell's chicken soup. And a few of my floormates will probably get accustomed to Jimmy Dean, Jack Kerouac, Pink Floyd and raspberry herbal tea.

So what if my closet is doorless? I'll buy a mint-green plastic shower curtain instead. I like mint-green. I like it here. If I get homesick enough, I still have my Felix the bear to hug every night reminding me of home (though I wait until my roommate is fast asleep).

I won't forget what the Starship Enterprise looks like, and Scottie will beam me back up for Thanksgiving and Christmas, won't you, Scottie? Scottie? Scottie?!

Odds and ends

Can you win a tower war?

As a transfer here from the somewhat subdued campus of the University of New Hampshire, I had yet to experience what the handbooks deemed Southwest as -- "city living." Southwest is unique in that it is the host of the F-YOU contest. As the fortunate resident of one of its low-rises, I get to hear new episodes night after night. So, I am seizing this opportunity to inform you, the public, of the contest and its rules. Even though I am considered a new student, I feel I have lived long enough in Southwest to have gathered sufficient information to pass on to those unfortunates who come from reasonably quiet places (in comparison to Southwest), like say, Detroit or Chicago. Picture this as best you can:

Alise S. Hartfield

Stereos are playing in SW, car doors are frequently slammed in all of the neighboring parking lots, and people's voices reverberate off the cement ground, raising these city noises above some people's tolerable decibel level. A resident who has nerve enough to be studying, or worse, sleeping, inadvertenly starts the contest by yelling, "Shaddap! I'm trying to sleep!" The first contestant always responds with the same answer: "F-YOU!" Hence the name. The response may be elongated, depending on your style and strength of your voice box. The louder the better. Here the real competion begins. The participants try to out yell each other, using the same phrase or a close facsimile. Sometimes, a creative contestant will insert a new curs, aimed at a rival dormitory or one's mother, by revealing what she eats and wears.

This brings up Contest Rule 1: The contestants must start after 12 a.m. and before 2 a.m. in order to qualify. At least one-hundred people must be woken up to witness the competition. After all, how fun was Let's Make a Deal without an audience?

Rule 2 dictates that here can neve be a split second of silence. If there is, and participants can't possibly think of what to yell next, a simple "AHHH" or "OHHH" will do. Remember, silence begets sleep, and we don't want any of that.

Rule 3, and this should be taken most seriously, states taht participants must keep their identity a secret. No one -- such as your roommate, floormates, or RA -- should be able to discern your voice, or discover that it is indeed you screaming out your window. Remember, your goal is to win by waking up as many people as you can. The last thing you want to do is have an authority on your back and get written up for what they think is immature behavior.

Finally, Rule 4: you must be a student here at the University. I know this sounds like a given, but you'd be surprised at the number of people who assume students have a greater maturity level and would rather sleep eight hours a night than participate in the contest. Nonsense! It takes far more stamina to be able to yell continuously than to make the grade around here.

The vocabulary needed to compete with other contestants' curses requires one to have a least a high school diploma, or 15 UMass pending credits. I know my own vocabulary has steadily improved in the short time I have been subjected to SW life. I have learned many new and catchy curse words used in ways beyond my academically-inclined mind. To think, this goes on in 5,400 of our front yards!

So, if you can't sleep in the noisy city, play the game. Whatever you do, don't call the University police. With the contest, you'll get a speedy response to your complaint.

"THE SUMMER DROUGHT... FIRES IN YELLOWSTONE... RADON CONTAMINATION... HURRICANE GILBERT.... I THINK I'VE LOST MY MATERNAL INSTINCT!"

Dukakis does wear short sleeves

David R. Mark's column "A blue suit to oblivion," (Sept. 16) in which he asked "will someone get this man (Gov. Dukakis) a short-sleeved shirt?" reminded me of a picture of the Governor with me and Evelyn Murphy taken last year. He does have a short-sleeved shirt.

I've had the pleasure of corresponding with the Governor and having several conversations with him. I find him to show on a personal level a greater warmth than the media attributes.

Gorbachev's asymmetrical foreign policy

Glasnost is such a cute little public relations scam. The way Gorbachev attempts to put the US on the defensive becomes more pathetic with each new proposal out of Red Square. Gorbachev's latest serenade, the one inviting the US to pull out of Subic Bay and Clark Air Force Base in the Philippines in return for the Soviets quitting Cam Ranh Bay in Vietnam is exemplary.

In terms of economic factors, glasnost is not a complex policy to decipher. It is a last-ditch effort to get the Soviet economy out of its post-WWII doldrums and into the realm of modern technology. In the process things must be eliminated; the most important of which is a military tab that incapsulates over 50 percent of the budget. Hence, the initial Gorbachev 'zero proposition'; the latter INF Treaty; the most recent South Pacific proposal; and the anti-military hot air in between, are intended for the Soviet bureaucracy -- not for the benefit of humanity.

Gorbachev's foreign policy approach is an outgrowth of glasnost. In his foreign policy speeches he notes a country's foreign concerns cannot be viewed as separate and distinct from domestic affairs, socio-economic objectives and requirements. Gorbachev also has never refuted the concepts of world revolution, and the inevitable showdown with the 'class enemy.' Quite the contrary. In his infamous Vladivostok address Gorbachev emphasized the need for a continued basis of "the principles of Marxism-Leninism and socialist internationalism."

Stuart Gottlieb

In concrete terms, the main Soviet foreign policy objective is to revitalize the domestic economic sphere to later re-group the military into what it once was; the leader of world revolution. But in the process of sanctifying the economy, which the Politburo hopes is just a waiting game, The Soviets are attempting to put the US on the defensive. They are trying to force the US into positions of saying no. In this way, the Soviets become the good guys. While this is distorted, there are idealists all over the free world who fall prey to such propaganda.

If nothing else, Gorbachev's proposed de-Superpowering of the South Pacific proves exactly what the Soviet intentions are. The proposal is intended to appear symmetrical, with the US having no legitimate reason for rejecting it. But the Cam Ranh Bay naval base is far smaller than Subic Bay and Clark Air Force base, the largest, and oldest American bases abroad.

Also, Vietnam is virtually a satellite of the Soviet Union; far from the relationship the US has with the Philippines. Every Vietnamese man in a uniform is there to propagate the doctrines of Moscow, as evidenced in the occupation of Kampuchea (Cambodia).

The Soviet Asian proposal is intended to create friction between the United States and the Philippines. It is no coincidence Gorbachev would make it 'possible' for the US to quit Subic Bay and Clark. Now is the most difficult time in US-Philippine negotiations over the bases.

The glasnost foreign policy objectives become clearer and clearer with the printing of each new headline in Pravda. The objective is to make the US appear to be the bad guy to the world. But behind each headline lies the motive of re-securing the Soviet military dominance developed during the detente years (culminating under Carter), and subsequently lost durirg the Reagan years.

CANDIDATES DEBATE – Vice President George Bush and Michael Dukakis debate in Winston-Salem last night. The panel and moderator sit in front

Duke drills Bush on Iran Contra

WINSTON-SALEM, N.C. (AP) — George Bush and Michael Dukakis clashed over deficits, drugs and the Pledge of Allegiance in a crackling campaign debate last night.

At one point, Bush said, "I hope people don't think I'm questioning his patriotism," but Dukakis said he was and added, "I resent it."

The presidential candidates tangled over the Iran–Contra affair when Dukakis said it was a "tragedy" for the Reagan administration to sell arms to Iran in exchange for hostages and said Bush endorsed the deal.

Bush said, "Yes, we shouldn't trade arms for hostages, but we have made vast improvements in our anti-terrorism."

Once the debate ended, the campaigns unleashed dozens of supporters to provide partisan analysis of the confrontation.

to the justices, "we just haven't had a lot of time to prepare for this."

The other requests for dismissal by Orefice centered on her contention that the restraining order is not binding on a legislative body.

"I don't believe the restraining order is proper," Orefice said. She said judicial review would be the proper procedure for the student court to follow to disallow the committee's move.

The justices, Pamela Hickey, Nancy Casey, and Milind Bharvikar, conferred on each of Orefice's requests and denied them. The justices are expected to reach a decision sometime this week.

The only testimony given in the case came from Fadel, who presided over the meeting of the Coordinating Committee in question, and Bill Collins, former SGA attorney general.

The testimony centered on both sides trying to establish whether it was proper for the judiciary to stop the committee from installing Silkoff and Rabinowitz.

Fadel and Collins were questioned by Kropp on whether they thought installing the elected co-presidents was unconstitutional because of the restraining order. Collins said the move was a violation of the order.

"The function of the [judiciary] is to maintain a balance on the SGA," Collins said.

Kropp also tried to establish that since Orefice ran for Student Trustee on the "Together We Win" ticket with Silkoff and Rabinowitz she would naturally support the co-president's being installed in office.

"The Coordinating Committee was fully aware of the restraining order and ignored it. They did this over the summer because they knew it would pass," Kropp said.

Orefice and Fadel countered that the co-presidents were put in office only to make things easier over the summer. Orefice said they were not given voting power, and could not use SGA money.

Orefice gave this reason for installing Silkoff and Rabinowitz in only a partial capacity: "If the full senate came back and overturned the Coordinating Committee's decision to ratify the election, then Shari and Jason would be liable for money they spent and every vote that was taken [which they participated in] could be overturned."

In her closing statement, Kropp said: "I think the strongest argument in this is that the committee is bound by the Student Judiciary. I can't point out enough how important it is to abide by the constitution."

Kropp said they violated the constitution because it gives power to the judiciary to rule over the legislative branch of the SGA.

ARTS/LIVING

Hubbard sees a better world

By JENNIFER DEMPSEY
Collegian Staff

Libby Hubbard knows she is attempting to answer an impossible question through her art.

"What is a good society? That is the most loaded question you can ask," said the 32-year old UMass Future Studies graduate student and artist.

But for the past 12 years, Hubbard has been searching for the answer through poetry, photography, paintings, collages and a dissertation called Art in Utopia.

"A good society," she said, "is one for all creativity. One where all people are fed and where all people can strive for happiness." And our present one is not good, she said.

"How this culture has developed is so unnatural and ugly. It doesn't allow people to pursue natural gifts," she said. "This 9 to 5 puritan work ethic is very unfair to people. I want to be an artist and poet. If I got a 9 to 5 job, I wouldn't really be able to do what I want. That's when I realized this system was slavery. We are such slaves to the economy. We have to look at the whole of what we're producing in this country and decide if it's that important or not."

And through her watercolors at her current show Ideas From the Unknown at the Northampton Center for the Arts, Hubbard strives to convey her idea of what is important.

"I'm trying to give people a planetary awareness. The idea that has to grow is the idea of a planetary government. I'm trying to make people think deeper than the three dimensional life they live," she said.

But it hasn't been easy, said Hubbard, a primarily self-taught artist.

Originally from North Carolina, Hubbard dropped out of three colleges before she ended up at the Narpa Institute in Boulder, Colorado in 1981 where she studied poetry under Allen Ginsberg and met her husband, communications graduate student, Charles Carroll. "I quit school to do my own independent thinking," she said. "In school, you always get shoved into other people's thinking. The hardest thing to do is find a voice. I think I have found mine artistically."

Bon Jovi bad; Cher fair; Psych Furs finished?

By CHRIS A. MUTHER
Collegian Correspondent

The Singles Scene

The Psychedelic Furs "All That Money Wants"

The Psychedelic Furs could be called the forefathers of post-punk. Throughout the '80s they have been producing masterpieces like "Love My Way," "The Ghost In You" and of course "Pretty In Pink." Lead singer Richard Butler's raspy voice is starting to wear a little thin and "All That Money Wants" is not in the same league as past Fur's hits. "All That Money Wants" isn't all we expect.

Kim Wilde "You Came"

Kim Wilde recently opened for Michael Jackson on the British leg of his tour and apparently she has learned a few things from the master. Her voice seems much improved since 1986's "You Keep Me Hanging On" remake, making "You Came" her best effort to date.

Cher "Main Man"

It seems Cher can do anything — anything except get a hit off of her latest album. Her first two releases off the self-titled album, "I Found Someone" and "We All Sleep Alone," only made a slight stir on the charts and her last single "Skin Deep" failed to reach the top 100. "Main Man" should change all that. This semi-ballad takes full advantage of Cher's vocal expertise with some great back-ground guitar. The only thing missing is Sonny.

Bon Jovi "Bad Medicine"

Bad music is more like it. Two years ago Bon Jovi took over the charts with their brand of infectious heavy metal pop. Now their back to haunt us again and the results aren't pretty. This misguided effort will probably linger around for months thanks to the 14-year old girls who'll buy the record to look at Jon bon Jovi's picture on the sleeve and the radio stations will overplay the song.

Transvision Vamp "Tell That Girl To Shut Up"

One of England's latest imports, Tranvision Vamp, puts the edge back on dance music. Thanks in part to producer Zeus B. Held (worked with Dead or Alive among others) what could have been standard dance fluff is an enjoyable new sound.

Depeche Mode "Strange Love"

First released in the spring of 1987, "Strange Love" has been re-released on the heels of Depeche Mode's very popular summer tour. It's a nice change from the usual grim sounds we're accustomed to hearing from the band. It's a perfect song for Depeche Mode, the subject matter fits their clanky techno-pop style flawlessly.

U2 "Desire"

U2 is back with a vengeance. This first single from the their forthcoming movie has a strength not seen in previous U2 songs. The riveting percussion back Bono's strong vocals constantly pushing the song forward. There's even a harmonica solo to top everything off. Both admirers and non-admirers should be pleased.

■ Hubbard

Hubbard's voice or movement is called "Lovolution: a non-violent spiritual revolution of the evolution of revolution; a world movement for political and economic freedom."

"The whole key to this lovolutionary movement is the mass media," she said. "It's difficult because so much is controlled by the mass media. Artists now don't have much of an audience, and they need an audience to feel connected to society."

Ideas From the Unknown, which closes Friday, was "a real joy to create," Hubbard said. "And I hope people realize it was a joy to do . . . and realize that there is a better way to live, as a society, as a culture."

UVC opens door to video

By ANDRE BUSI
Collegian Correspondent

For those who frequent the Student Union Building, the Union Video Center is the group that presents various items of information and entertainment over the monitors which are strategically located throughout the building. Providing passers-by with an interesting diversion, UVC maintains a quasi-loyal following, particularly in the Video Viewing Lounge (201 SUB).

For the past 12 years, UVC has provided easy access to video equipment and instruction on its use for those interested enough to become members. And its membership continues to grow.

Among the benefits included in UVC's free membership, is access to a considerable amount of equipment. The Center runs two series of workshops designed to teach the unfamiliar how to work in the video medium. The black-and-white workshop (comprising about 8 hours over a period of one to two weeks) shows how to manage lighting, sound, videotaping and the editing process. All editing is done on a Beta deck, a relatively simple system that the UVC plans to replace with a higher-tech Super-VHS deck (provided they acquire the funding).

After this, there is the color production workshop (taking about 4 hours) which gives instruction in the delicacies of lighting and editing in color and the operation of their 39/90 color cameras (the black-and-white workshop requires a $40 fee, while the color workshop is $15). After completion of both these workshops, the member is eligible to use the extensive facilities at the studio, including the newly acquired Panasonic CamCorders. The studio and equipment are reserved by the member for a specific amount of time, usually arranged a week in advance to prevent any confusion.

Although there is no membership fee for undergraduates, since the Graduate Student Senate decided not to allocate any funds to the UVC in fiscal year '89, the Center chose to apply the same non-student membership fee to grad students next year.

"The Collegian is distributed all over the Five-College Area, and WMUA is broadcast all throughout the valley," said UVC president Philip McNamara, "all we have is a few monitors around the SUB." This state of affairs should come to an end once the present day cable system is expanded to campus-wide service, after the completion of the University's new telecommunications system over the next few years.

The UVC broadcasts tapes from their video library, an ever growing collection of fil..is, short entertainment pieces, video-art, documentaries, and coverage of local concerts, rallies, speakers and sports events. All viewing requests are welcome.

Also in the works is a bi-weekly news program, the University Update, which will concentrate specifically on local and campus issues. The show will air Tuesdays and Thursdays from noon to 12:30. The search is on for a news producer. Any takers? The UVC is located just up the hallway from the Hatch.

Look for an interview with Living Colour this week.

Toto's latest worth another listen

By JIM COLE
Collegian Staff

The Seventh One
Toto
Columbia Records

One of the most original rock groups from the late '70's with the strangest name is Toto. Rising from obscurity, they hit the big time with their 1982 album Toto IV, which received several Grammys. However, that acclaim and success has been elusive for the band ever since.

Their last album The Seventh One was released last April. So why am I reviewing it now? Why not! Is there a rule saying one has to review something within an hour of its release? No.

In all honesty, I was not as partial to this album as I was with 1986's Fahrenheit, one neither the critics nor public seemed to like, but I thought was their best since IV. Every tune on that album grabbed me the first time I heard it, and I still listen to them often.

My response to The Seventh One is quite different. At first, I was disappointed, as I found many of the tunes bland. But with repeated listenings, the depth and maturity of the compositions were revealed.

"Pamela," which was on the airwaves last spring, is the best song on the disc and the one that caught my interest. Lead vocalist Joseph Williams (son of composer John) is very good, and puts his heart into the tune, but in this, as in all his leads, he doesn't have the richness that former vocalist Bobby Kimball did.

"Anna" is a quiet, introspective tune in the best Toto tradition. With a rich orchestral background and moving vocals by Steve Lukather, it's one of the best on the album. "Stop Loving You" starts off slow, then changes key and tempo in the best jazzy tradition. A bright, upbeat tune with lots of brass and instrumental work, it has a needed amount of wildness.

"Mushanga" is a long, epic style song with foreign sounds in the tradition of the groups' older hit "Africa." Unfortunately, it doesn't measure up — it's the kind of song that's all dressed up but goes nowhere. "These Chains," once again helmed by original vocalist Lukather, has the "old" Toto sound, a sound I prefer.

The last few songs all fit into the pop vein. "Stay Away" features a tinny guitar blasting one senseless, and a surprise with female vocalists in the background. "Straight for the Heart" has a strong bass guitar beat and kick-ass quality. And "Only the Children" has a deceiving title, one that would make you expect a gentle tune, but in fact is one of the hardest songs on the album.

The Seventh One is growing on me, and is clearly a worthy effort by a distinguished band. It's not their best work, but certainly not their worst.

Boston cops cite landlords

BOSTON (AP) — As part of a crackdown on drug dealing, police have cited 11 landlords for allegedly allowing illegal drug activity to take place in their properties.

"We're putting landlords in Boston on notice that we're going to start going after them if they allow this kind of activity to go on," said Deputy Superintendent James Wood, commander of the Drug Control Unit.

The landlords could face criminal charges following appearances scheduled in Boston Housing Court this week.

Landlords who knowingly allowed their holdings to be used for drug dealing or drug use can be fined as much as $1,000 and sentenced to one year in prison under a recent change in Massachusetts law.

Boston police brought complaints against the landlords last week, claiming that despite warnings, they have not acted to eliminate drug activity in their buildings.

"Landlords may not be aware of this particular law," Wood said. "What we're going to do is made them aware. We want them to clean up their property, and if they need help then we're there to assist them."

One landlord, Michael Liebman, had five complaints brought against him, according to court records, alleging that police found drugs inside a Dorchester building he owns on five different occasions.

Neighbors of the building cited said they were pleased about the action.

"It's about time they go after him," said a 53-year-old woman who asked not to be named. "They're always in there doing and dealing drugs. It goes on all the time."

Cape Cod faces shortage of doctors

HYANNIS (AP) — Cape Cod, one of the fastest growing parts of the state, faces a critical shortage of doctors, according to hospital officials and physicians in the region.

Across the Cape, "Many patients cannot find a doctor because waiting rooms. . . are full," James Lyons, president of the Cape Cod Hospital in Hyannis, told the Boston Sunday Globe.

"We used to have more than 200," in the Barnstable District Medical Society, said Dr. Scott Fox, an eye, ear, nose and throat specialist at Falmouth Hospital, "but in recent years we've lost about 20 percent. The drop started three years ago and has accelerated in the last year and a half."

The region's relatively low salaries and high number of senior citizens who demand more medical services were two of the reasons given for the acute shortage. Because of relatively low salaries, the cost of malpractice insurance and the restrictions on billing patients over and above what their insurance companies pay hit harder on the Cape than elsewhere, said Fox.

Lyons said Cape Cod Hospital's department of medicine has gone from 35 doctors in 1985 to a low of 17 and back to 21.

Last month, the hospital spent $7,200 paying overtime to staff members who volunteered extra hours to make up for the personnel shortage. This month, that overtime is expected to run $13,000.

Fox said he and an associate in his private medical practice have been searching for 36 months for a third associate. Head-hunters, he said, "just laugh when they hear the first-year salary - $50,000.'

The real issue, according to Susan Sherry, executive director of Health Care for All, a Boston-based health care consumer advocacy group, is not a shortage of doctors but how they distribute themselves geographically.

"We think more financial rewards should be directed to geographically undeserved areas to give physicians reason to establish practices in those areas," Sherry said.

First woman bishop elected

PHILADELPHIA (AP) — The Rev. Barbara C. Harris, elected the first woman bishop in the Anglican Communion's 450-year history, said Sunday her elevation is the latest step in a movement to bring the church into the mainstream.

Ms. Harris, 58, a former public relations executive, was elected Saturday to the position of suffragan, or assistant, bishop for the eastern Massachusetts diocese of the Episcopal Church. The diocese, which includes Boston, is the nation's largest in both geography and population.

"A fresh wind is blowing across this church of ours," she said in her first sermon at Philadelphia's Church of the Advocate since her election.

Several elections earlier this year show the church is changing, said Ms. Harris, who is black. Two black priests were elected coadjutor bishops, who are first in line to succeed their presiding bishops, without first serving as assistant.

One of them, the Rev. Herbert Thompson Jr., was installed in Cincinnati on Saturday as the first black bishop of the Episcopal Diocese of Southern Ohio.

Ms. Harris told a congregation of 50 people that her election "is of significance to the Episcopal Church in the United States and to the worldwide Anglican Communion."

The Episcopal Church is one of 27 self-governing church bodies in 164 countries around the world that make up the Anglican Communion. About 70 million people belong, with 2.5 million in the United States.

She likened the church's actions to the Rev. Jesse Jackson's campaigns for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1984 and 1988.

Roger Clemens bounced back from a line drive off the elbow and pitched a complete-game shutout as the Red Sox dumped the Yankees, 6-0 yesterday at Yankee Stadium.

Clemens can't be stopped as Sox cruise, 6-0

NEW YORK (AP) – Roger Clemens and the Boston red Sox survived an early scare. Now, with a week to go, the season-long scramble in the American League East is theirs to win.

Clemens, overcoming the effects of a line drive off his pitching elbow, worked seven shutout innings yesterday as the Red Sox stopped the New York Yankees, 6-0 and cut their magic number to three.

"We just did what we had to do to win. So did I," Clemens said.

Boston, which won five of seven against New York in the last two weeks, pushed the Yankees 5½ games behind. Detroit is now in second, 4½ back, while Milwaukee is five back.

"We weren't good enough. We had our chances and we couldn't do anything with it," admitted New York's Jack Clark.

Clark and Dave Winfield, the middle of the Yankees' lineup, were particularly ineffective. In those seven games against Boston, Winfield was 1-for-11 with runners in scoring position and Clark was 1-for-10.

Mike Greenwell and Dwight Evans, the heart of the Boston order, came through in the clutch. Greenwell hit a three-run homer in the first inning and Evans hit a two-run shot in the fifth.

"We're in the driver's seat," said Greenwell, who skipped pregame batting practice and rested instead. "We wanted to jump out today. We knew Roger was going to be out there."

Clemens was almost out of there, too.

Rickey Henderson opened the bottom of the first with a liner that hit Clemens in the back of the right elbow. Boston manager Joe Morgan, trainer Charlie Moss and teammates rushed to the mound and surrounded Clemens.

"I wanted to hold on for a few moments and see if I was OK. I was," Clemens said. "But it will be sore tomorrow."

After a few warmup pitches, Clemens resumed. At the end of the inning, he walked to the dugout, passed Henderson and said, "It's going to take a lot more to get me out of the game."

Earlier this season, Henderson hit a ball off Clemens' hip. In his final start of the 1986 season, Clemens was hit in the same elbow by a line drive from Baltimore's John Stefero and had to leave the game, although he recovered in time to start in the AL playoffs.

"That was a completely different set of circumstances. In that other game, we had already clinched and I was out there nonchalanting around. That's how I got hit," he said.

"This time the ball was back at me and I reacted the best I could," the two-time Cy Young winner said. "It's good to have something to put a little life in you."

Wade Boggs went 3-for-5 and raised his average to .364, the best in baseball. Lee Smith closed for the Red Sox, allowing two hits. Rick Rhoden, 12-11, saw his five-game winning streak end.

Clemens, 18-11, improved his career record against New York to 7-3 and 4-0 in Yankee Stadium. He struck out seven Yankees, raising his major league-leading total to 287, and walked two. He won for just the third time in nine decisions.

The Red Sox, cheered on by a sizable contingent, got all the runs they needed right away. Boggs opened the game with a single, Evans walked with one out and Greenwell hit his 22nd home run.

Boggs led off the fifth with another single and Evans connected for his 19th home run. The Red Sox scored again in the eighth when Todd Benzinger singled, Ellis Burks doubled and Jody Reed had an RBI grounder.

Tigers sweep O's

BALTIMORE (AP) – Jack Morris allowed only a seventh-inning single to Mickey Tettleton to lead Detroit in the opener of a doubleheader and pinch-hitter Fred Lynn's grand slam in the ninth inning of the second game gave the Tigers a sweep over the Baltimore Orioles yesterday, 2-1 and 7-4.

The Tigers took sole possession of second place in the American League East and trail Boston by 4½ games going into the last week of the season. Any combination of three Detroit losses and Boston victories will eliminate the Tigers from contention.

The Orioles' record dropped to 53-101, only the second time since moving to Baltimore in 1954 that they've lost that many games.

Morris, 14-13, did not allow a hit until Mickey Tettleton's one-out single in the seventh. The right-hander struck out eight and walked two. The losing pitcher was Mark Williamson, 5-7, who worked 8 2-3 innings, allowing six hits, walking one and striking out three.

In the second game, the Tigers trailed 4-3 entering the ninth and had been held hitless since the sixth inning by relievers Mark Thurmond and Tom Niedenfuer, 3-4.

Doyle Alexander, 14-11, won his third straight decision, allowing six hits in nine innings, walking one and striking out one.

"The thing for us against Princeton was all but two of their players were from California. They were all from volleyball centers and were very good players. They served tough and they were excellent blockers," Ford said.

The first three games were almost even, the Minutewomen held a two game to one lead, but PU reached double-digits in every game. The Tigers humbled UMass in the fourth game, 15-3.

"They really shut down our offense in the fourth game. All we could do is tip," Ford said.

In the fifth game, UMass' offense woke up. The Minutewomen were led by junior setter Karen Ferguson, the leader of the big O had five kills in the final frame which the Minutewomen won 15-9.

"We were passing and holding the blockers. We have to do that," Ford said.

Princeton was a marathon match, UMass had 60 kills in 165 attempts and the match lasted for more than two hours. On Saturday, the Minutewomen got exactly what the needed – a pushover match from Sienna.

Although they trailed in every game, the Minutewomen easily handled Sienna.

"The important thing is we didn't lose a game. It was a morning match after a tough Friday match and (Sienna) played well for what they had," Ford said.

Howard was UMass' fourth victim. The Minutewomen were lead by Smith (16 kills, 2 aces), Barbara Meehan (9 kills), and Christine McEnroe (6 kills).

"We were slow to start but once we get into a flow we don't lose to those teams," Ford said..

In the weekend's final match, UMass fought two opponents — Fairleigh Dickenson and fatigue.

"(Fairleigh Dickenson) worked hard every game. Their middle blocker was big and we had a hard time blocking her," Ford said.

They split the first four games and when the money was on the line in the fifth, UMass was there. They could have quit after playing 20 games already, but they hung on to beat FD.

"The fifth game (15-3) was the best game of the entire match. But fatigue was a factor," Ford said.

Cross country second at NU meet

By JOHN STEVEN MARPLE
Collegian Correspondent

In many sports, it's just as important to have quality backup people as it is to have quality starters; just ask the Boston Celtics – they probably have the best starting five in the league.

But the fact that they have not won the title in the last two seasons is directly related to their reserves. No re-enforcements, no title. It's that simple.

University of Massachusetts cross country coach Ken O'Brien has found that phrase to be true. For the second week in a row he has not gotten the production from his middle runners that is crucial in team success. As a result, for the second weekend in a row UMass place second in a three-school meet. The final score on Saturday showed Northeastern on top with 27 points, followed by UMass (39) and Keene State.

"I was a little disappointed," said O'Brien. "It was very similar to last week. We showed some signs of rust. Two runners had good days, two had average days and two had poor days."

Northeastern's Brad Schlapak won the meet with a time of 26:09. He was followed by Scott Hatch of Keene (26:25). UMass' Kerry Boyle was next in line (26:30) followed by Northeastern's Chris Bianchi (26:56). Junior Art Smith of UMass rounded out the top five, crossing the finish line in 27:12.

O'Brien was pleased to place two runners in the top five spots, but after that the well ran dry.

"I had hoped for more help from our backup people," he said. "If we could have had a little more help in the top 10 we would have been in good shape.

"Boiler and Smith did very well," he added. "They looked comfortable out there. But our question mark revolves around our three, four and five men and how they respond."

O'Brien will have two weeks to work with his backup men as UMass is idle until an Oct. 7 date with Connecticut.

Extra Laps: UMass drops to 2-2 on the season . . . in last week's New England Coaches' Poll the Minutemen were ranked third, behind Dartmouth and Providence . . . in their upcoming meet against Connecticut, UMass will have history on its side. Since the two schools first squared off in 1924, the Minutemen have dominated the series, leading 22-9.

Sunday's game with Rhode Island easily could have been a very laughable game for UMass. The WRams could not stop the UMass attack from assaulting URI goalie Annette Harris for 41 shots.

Rhode Island was lucky that it was not embarrassed in the first half.

"I think in the first half, everybody could have scored," UMass coach Pam Hixon said. "Everybody had an opportunity. We just couldn't get it over the endline."

URI's response to UMass' storm on their goal was to foul and foul and foul. The WRams were called for 25 penalty corners as opposed to five for UMass.

In the first half, Tonia Kennedy started right where she left off in the Rutgers game by putting the Minutewomen up 1-0, at 17:49 of the first half.

But that was all the scoring to be done in the first half as the buzzer sounded with UMass up 1-0 having outshot URI 18-5.

The fouling might have worked for awhile for the WRams but it didn't in the second half when the Minutewomen took complete control of the game outshooting URI 23-0.

Kennedy started things off for the Minutewomen at 18:42 by beating Harris for the second time to give UMass a 2-0 lead. Senior co-captain Ruth Vasapolli assisted on the play.

At 22:10 of the second, junior Kathy DeAngelis made the score 3-0 after UMass drew a penalty stroke. It was DeAngelis' fifth goal of the year.

Kennedy completed the hat trick at 24:30 with her eighth goal of the season. She now leads the team in goals.

Harris finished up a very busy day with 26 saves to her credit and UMass kept its unbeaten season going.

Flanker Mike Tobin caught a 17-yard touchdown from Palazzi and also made a great sliding catch for a 30-yard gain in the Minutemen's final drive.

And tight end Kenny Girouard turned his second reception of the season into a 6-yard touchdown in the second quarter.

But the defense, led by 14 tackles by John McKeown, had a hard time stopping Harvard's 1-2 punch of halfback Tony Hinz (262 all-purpose yards and a touchdown) and Yohe (20-of-36, 312 yards, 1 interception, 2 TDs).

"Yohe is really exceptional," Reid said. "He throws with pinpoint accuracy."

UMass bids Harvard adieu, 45-28

By MATT GERKE
Collegian Staff

CAMBRIDGE — Members of the University of Massachusetts football team knew Saturday's game against Harvard would likely be the last time they would face the Crimson in their careers.

Harvard is missing from the schedule for the next four years, and there is a good chance the teams won't play again.

The Minutemen wanted their memories of this competitive relationship to be good, not bad.

"We wanted to leave something in their minds," junior split end Chip Mitchell said.

The Minutemen gave Harvard something to think about, racking up 525 yards on the way to a 45-28 victory.

Mitchell, who joined noseguard Joe Cullen as game captains, certainly did his part, as he caught six passes for 135 yards and added a 29-yard run and a 69-yard kickoff return.

UMass improves to 2-1 while the Crimson fall to 1-1.

"We got hurt by the big play," Harvard coach Joe Restic said. "We'd work hard for our scores and they'd come right back. That was discouraging."

Mitchell's return may have been the turning point in the game. The Crimson had just taken a 14-7 lead on a quarterback keeper by Tom Yohe. The drive was set up when Jerome Bledsoe fumbled a punt and Harvard recovered at the UMass 14-yard line.

But after Yohe's 1-yard score, Mitchell took Alan Hall's kickoff at the 12 and returned it to the Harvard 19 before being forced out of bounds by Henry Olson.

"That play broke our back," Restic said.

After an 18-yard run by tailback Kevin Smellie, fullback Jim Pastorick dove in from the 1-yard line and the game was tied. From that point on, the Minutemen rolled.

Led by fullback David Mitchell (23 carries for 112 yards and a touchdown) and senior quarterback Dave Palazzi (10-of-18 with three touchdowns), the UMass offense was able to move almost at will for the rest of the game.

"Dave handled himself very well," Reid said. "He's running our offense."

Palazzi's only mistake was a pass late in the first half that was intended for Mitchell but intercepted by Chris Rezendes and returned to the UMass 45.

The Crimson drove to the Minutemen's 5-yard line, but on a 4th-and-5 from the 5, Yohe threw a low pass to Mark Bianchi, who was open in the right corner of the end zone, but dropped the ball.

"That was one of the keys," Reid said. "We got a little greedy at the end of the first half and threw the interception. But we held them on the next drive and that gave our defense a little confidence."

The UMass defense has been suspect this season, having allowed 114 points in its first three games.

"I saw some improvement in the defense today," Reid said. "But I won't know how much until I see the films."

And the Minutemen showed that when their offense is on, it is virtually unstoppable.

"There's been injuries and things on the defense but they're working their hardest," Palazzi said. "The offense has tried to take it upon ourselves."

"The offense didn't surprise me," Reid said. "We expect to score on every drive."

The Minutemen lived up to their expectations. After Pastorick's touchdown, they converted five of the next seven times they had the ball, before a lackluster drive late in the fourth quarter when the game was well in hand.

"UMass is a good team," Restic said. "They're big and strong, their quarterback executes well, and they have good balance."

The Minutemen's most successful play Saturday, and what appeared to be their favorite, was the option play, with Palazzi either keeping the ball or pitching out to Smellie. The play was called 14 times and netted 113 yards.

"The option works well for us," Palazzi said. "I like running the ball except when I'm getting killed."

Mitchell's big run came on a reverse option which he turned into a 29-yard gain. He also had a 78-yard touchdown reception from Palazzi which gave the Minutemen a 30-21 lead with 11:30 left in the third quarter.

Kicker Silvio Bonvini, who hit his only field goal attempt (from 29 yards) and was 6-for-6 in extra point attempts, hit the point after to give UMass a comfortable 10-point lead.

Bonvini was one of several Minutemen who contributed but were perhaps outshone by Palazzi, Chip Mitchell and Dave Mitchell.

Volleyball sweeps to Colgate Tourney win

By RONN GARRY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts volleyball team proved two things this past weekend in the Colgate University tournament. First, this year's team can play well on the road and second, this team is ready for the upcoming Atlantic 10 schedule.

The Minutewomen won all five of their matches at Colgate, giving them first place of the tourney and a perfect 8-0 record.

On Friday, UMass defeated Colgate 15-4, 15-10, 16-14 and Princeton University 15-13, 10-15, 15-11, 3-15, 15-9. Then on Saturday, the Minutewomen swept Sienna College 15-12, 15-6, 15-7; Howard University 13-15, 15-2, 15-9, 15-4, Fairleigh Dickenson University 12-15, 15-8, 5-15, 15-8, 15-3.

"The tournament was exactly what we needed," UMass coach Carol Ford said. "It was more than what we expected...it was tougher than we thought it would be."

The Minutewomen were challenged not only by the taller squads of Princeton and Fairleigh Dickenson, but physically also — they played 21 games in just about 24 hours.

"The last match really came down to endurance," Ford said.

The Minutewomen got the privilege of playing the host team first, and the host team had the privilege of getting trampled.

"Colgate was not a real strong team. We should have beaten them in three and we did. We went out there and took charge," Ford said.

UMass was paced by Nancy Sullivan (7 kills, 1 ace), Julie Smith (6 kills, 3 aces), and Juliet Primer (6 kills).

Colgate did, however, almost push UMass into a fourth game.

"I think Colgate kept improving," as the match went along, Ford said.

Friday's nightcap proved to be much more difficult for UMass.

The Minutewomen ran into one of the top teams in the Ivy League — the Tigers of Princeton University.

Men's soccer falls, 2-0

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Correspondent

Since opening the season with a pair of victories over Maine and New Hampshire, the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team has since lost three of its last four contests.

The latest setback was dealt to the Minutemen by the third-ranked team in New England (according to the Intercollegiate Soccer Association of America), the University of Vermont Catamounts.

The final score of Saturday's contest, in Burlington Vt., was 2-0 in favor of the hosts. David Johnson opened the scoring for the Catamounts with 24:12 run off the clock, taking the assist from teammates Dan Bokan and Kyle Bourque and pushing the ball past UMass goalie Richard King (11 saves on the afternoon).

The Minuteman defense held on for nearly 50 minutes of play before yielding the second goal of the contest. At the 72:01 mark, Mike Beaulieu redirected a feed from Roberto Beall into the back of the net, leaving the score at 2-0.

The loss left the Minutemen, ranked No. 5 in New England prior to the week's worth of losses to Dartmouth and UVM, with an even 3-3 record on the season, while Vermont improved to 6-1-1. Next up, the Minutemen will conclude this draining three-game stretch of road contests with a visit to New Haven, Conn. to face Yale, Wednesday at 3 p.m.

Field hockey rolls over Rutgers, URI

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

Playing two games in 24 hours is tough. But when a team has to play two games on the road in 24 hours, that's a challenge.

That's what the University of Massachusetts field hockey team had to do this weekend . . . and the Minutewomen responded to the challenge with a couple of 4-0 wins over Rutgers University on Saturday and the Universtiy of Rhode Island on Sunday.

UMass, 6-0 and 2-0 in the Atlantic-10 Conference, took over first place in the A-10 East. Rhode Island and Rutgers are now 1 1/2 games back.

For the Minutewomen, it was their fifth shutout in a row. UMass has only given up one goal all season.

Senior goaltender Cindy Cox, who has appeared in all six of those games, lowered her goals against average to a measly 0.17.

"We have our occasional moments and we play brilliant at times," UMass coach Pam Hixon said. "Now we're at a point where our defense has to establish a mode of consistency."

That's pretty scary. The Minutewomen have consistently shut down their opponents. Cox has not had to handle many shots. Saturday's win over Rutgers was probably her toughest start of the season.

For one half anyway, Rutgers gave the Minutewomen all they could handle. Rutgers goaltender Heather McDevitt, who finished the day with 18 saves, shut UMass out in the first half while the defense limited the UMass attack to nine shots.

Rutgers didn't fair much better though, as they were only able to get four shots off in the first half. But they were still in the game.

However, UMass had figured out the Scarlet Knights by the second half.

"They're a long-ball type of team, they'd hit the ball down field and then crash on it," Hixon said. "It took us awhile to solve the puzzle."

Offensively, the Minutewomen turned things around completely in the second half. Sophomore Elise McDevitt started things off by coming off the bench to score the first goal of the game at 11:45 of the second half to give UMass a 1-0 lead.

Next, came junior forward Mara Frattasio at 24:48 to give UMass a 2-0 lead. Both goals were unassisted.

"In the second half, Elise and Mara really gave us a huge spark," Hixon said. "They really made things happen."

At 27:35 of the half, Kennedy made the score 3-0 with the first of two goals that she scored on the afternoon. The second one came at 32:37 to wrap up a 4-0 win for UMass.

UMass outshot the Scarlet Knights 20-5 in the second half. Cox finished the game with a total of nine saves.

Acting Minuteman editor violating SGA policy

By RICK SANTOS
Collegian Staff

The acting editor in chief of the Minuteman newspaper at the University of Massachusetts is breaking a student government policy by holding that position.

Bill Collins, a former Student Government Association attorney general, is not a student at the University in any capacity, according to SGA officials and University police.

The SGA Constitution states a student must be a member of the SGA to be an executive officer, an assistant executive officer, a secretary, or a financial officer in a registered student organization, regardless of the title officers may use. To be a member of the SGA a student must pay the Student Activities Trust Fund fee.

After saying yesterday, "I'm not going to be involved in the SGA," Collins defended his role at the paper by saying he is not an officer for the paper. "I'm just trying to bring respectability ... to the newspaper."

Student Activities Office Business Manager Steve Sullivan said Collins was not listed as an officer in the Minuteman as of April.

Collins made this point after he failed to disprove officers of student organizations must be members of the SGA.

He refused to discuss whether or not he is a UMass student. "It's none of anyone's business," he said.

Shari Silkoff, the SGA co-president-elect, said she was told by the Dean of Students office Collins was not a student after she attempted to file charges against him through the office. The charges were in relation to his being found by University police trespassing in his old office in the Student Union building.

The incident, which occurred Sept. 13, resulted in Silkoff requesting the police to order the office lock to be re-cored. Collins was found with a key he refused to surrender to the police, police said.

Silkoff said student government officials requested the lock be re-cored last semester because they were afraid something similar would happen.

She said the lone key to the re-cored office lock is being held by an official until a new attorney general can be found.

The search for an attorney general is still going on but one is expected to be in office by the end of October, Silkoff said.

The Dean of Students Office declined to comment on Collins' status as a student or the incident.

As a result of this incident, Collins is in hot water with police.

They told Silkoff that if Collins was to badger her or any other students working in student-run offices, the police could be summoned to arrest him.

Director of Public Safety Arthur Hilson said, "Our records indicate that at the time of our involvement (Sept. 13) he was not a student."

Hilson confirmed Silkoff's statement and said the charges that could be brought against the former attorney general would be trespassing. "If he's not a student, he has no reason to be in office space," unless he is conducting business or visiting someone in the office.

This policy would be typical of any office, Hilson said. An arrest would depend on the circumstances of any situation the former attorney general may become involved," he said.

Debate 'spins' new drama

By JOHN KING
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — There was Democratic Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, leaning over reporters' shoulders to say he thought Michael Dukakis won the debate decisively and succeeded in looking "presidential".

Not so, said Wyoming Republican Sen. Alan Simpson, who labeled George Bush the presidential figure and said Dukakis "looked absolutely programmed" and came across as "plastic".

The high-stakes Dukakis-Bush debate took the game of political spin to new heights, as familiar faces from both parties were flown in to Winston-Salem, N.C., to provide not-so-objective analysis of the first encounter between the presidential contenders.

With polls showing a close race for the White House and undecided voters anxiously awaiting the debate, neither candidate risked being outspun and each paid the way for a phalanx of instant commentators ready to offer insight to anyone with a notebook, tape recorder or camera.

In politics, putting the best light on an event is called spin — a task generally reserved for campaign strategists. Not this time. While the aides were there in droves, they were joined by prominent politicians-turned-analysts.

Bush campaign chairman James A. Baker III defended the huge spin control operation on Monday, saying the campaign simply wanted to offer its 'honest' assessment of the debate.

'Everyone of us sitting in that room — and there must have been 20 or 22 of us — feel, felt that the vice president won that debate and acquitted himself extremely well,' Baker said. Despite the expense and effort, even some partisans thought the spin control was wasted.

'I thought it was all pretty much the same,' said Democratic pollster Harrison Hickman. 'I don't think anybody got a win at spin.'

Newest Mass Transformation project blossoms on campus

By JOHN SWANSON
Collegian Staff

Imagine the entire Greek Area contributing their efforts to an enormous community service project, hundreds of young men and women spending a weekend with backs bent and brows dripping over . . . daffodils?

Under the supervision of Stockbridge School of Agriculture students, about 600 volunteers from the 24 fraternities and sororities will spend this weekend planting 125,000 daffodil bulbs, according to Stacey Chase of the Office of Public Information. The project, which is part of the university's 125th anniversary celebration, is the latest of the Mass Transformation efforts.

"The bulbs will be planted all over campus," said Nancy Garrabrants, a member of the plant and soil sciences department faculty. "If you've noticed the freshly rototilled areas around campus, that's where we'll be planting them," she said.

Garrabrants helped plan the project with Assistant Professor Susan Mulgrew, also of the plant and soil science department, and Assistant Professors Jack Ahern and H. Dennis Ryan, both of the landscape architecture and regional planning department.

Planting will be divided into four four-hour shifts, according to an Office of Public Information press release: Friday from 1 to 5 p.m.; Saturday from 8 a.m. to noon, and then from 1 to 5 p.m.; Sunday from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m.

The six different varieties of daffodils will be planted in 150 flower beds all over campus, according to the release. The plant was chosen for its easy maintenance and the rodent-repelling substance given off by the daffodil bulb, Garrabrants said.

The Mass Transformation project began in 1986 when volunteers renovated the University of Massachusetts Tower Library. Smaller projects, such as the rebuilding of the campus maze, have also been taken on as part of the program.

The next project in the Mass Transformation program is scheduled for Arbor Day weekend in April, when volunteers are expected to plant 1,000 trees around campus, Chase said.

Deirdre Ling, vice chancellor of university relations and development, praised the latest project in the effort to upgrade the campus.

"I think it's terrific that the same spirit of cooperation that made the original Mass Transformation project the tremendous success it was is alive and well on the campus this autumn. I'm glad we have extended the meaning of campus beautification beyond cleaning and sprucing up to the planting of flowers and trees that will last," she said.

Garrabrants was equally enthusiastic.

I think it's a beginning and we'd like to see beautification become a yearly event. A more attractive environment makes you feel better about where you live," she said.

Shiite accused in hijack trial

FRANKFURT, West Germany (AP) — Navy diver Clinton Suggs testified yesterday he believed he would be "the next to die" after hijackers shot Robert Stethem and threw him out of a hijacked TWA jetliner.

Suggs testified at the murder and air piracy trial of Mohammed Ali Hamadi. The Lebanese Shiite Moslem is charged in the June 1985 hijacking, in which Stethem, a 23 year old US Navy diver, was killed and 39 Americans were held hostage for 17 days.

Stethem was "still alive" after being shot and thrown onto the runway in Beirut, Suggs said, adding: "I could hear him moaning."

Suggs also said Hami remarked "let the pig suffer," when a flight attendant asked the hijackers if she could loosen Stethem's bound hands.

Stethem and Suggs had been taken to the plane's first class section after the flight was diverted to Beirut.

"I heard a lot of screaming to the tower in Arabic, I couldn't understand it" he testified.

"Then I could hear Robert (Stethem) scream," the 32 year old Suggs said.

Other witnesses, including flight attendant Uli Derickson, have said Stethem never made a sound while being beaten my the hijackers. But Suggs, when asked about that testimony, maintained: "I heard him scream."

Then I heard a gunshot, the door opened and a second shot," said Suggs. "At this point I just listened for Bob, he was still alive and I could hear him moaning."

Reagan changes Gulf convoy policy

NEW YORK (AP) — President Reagan decided yesterday to end US convoys of American flagged ships in the Persian Gulf but will keep US forces in the gulf to aid threatened ships, the White House announced.

Presidential spokesman Marlin Fitzwater told reporters that Reagan acted "after reviewing the current cease-fire . . . which has been in effect since Aug. 20 and consulting with allies and friends in the region."

There have been no attacks on the gulf shipping since the cease-fire began.

Fitzwater said the president made the decision in Washington before leaving for new York, where he was to discuss the change with heads of the state from the region.

Reagan, after a farewell speech to the UN General Assembly, had meeting set with Sheik Jamir Ahmed Sabah, the ruling emir of Kuwait, and leaders of the Gulf Cooperation Council, which is headed by Saudi Arabia.

The president's meeting with the sheik is the first since Sabah came to power in 1976.

The convoy operation, begun 14 months ago, involved a precise Navy formation used to protect against potential Iranian attacks Kuwaiti tankers re-registered under the US flag.

"The modification entails a change from a 'tight escort' procedure to an 'accompany' regime," Fitzwater said on Air Force One as Reagan flew to New York.

"In an 'accompany' regime, US forces will be positioned such that they can take appropriate actions if American flagged ships are directly threatened."

There have been no attacks on gulf shipping since the cease-fire went into effect.

The spokesman said that even with the change, the United States "intends to maintain in the gulf the forces required to protect US-flagged shipping and support our national objectives. These changes in no way alter our commitment to freedom of navigation in the gulf."

The spokesmen said in the move is "the first step in the change of our presence. We will continue to review our presence in the gulf and will make changes as the threat diminishes." For now, he said, the Navy will not reduce its presence in the gulf.

The United States has 26 ships in its Joint Task Force Middle East, including 17 in the Persian Gulf. As of Sept 16, the Navy had conducted 85 convoy operations since the escorts began.

Poli-sci profs react to presidential debate

Syed, Der Derian differ on Dukakis' rebuttal of 'card-carrying member' phrase

Professor Anwar Syed

On the debate . . .

"I don't think that either [candidate] has had a break through of any kind — that either one made a very substantial gain over the other as a result of being next to each other in a debate format.

"Some people are saying that Mr. Dukakis may have won some points by claiming to resent that Mr. Bush was doubting his patriotism.

"I don't think that Mr. Bush quite did that. Mr Bush was only quoting what Mr. Dukakis had himself been saying that he was a card-carrying member of the American Civil Liberties Union."

"The phrase card-carrying in the 1950s used to be referred to the Communists. I think that if Mr. Bush had invented this phrase with reference to Mr. Dukakis, you might say that he was being wicked.

On the debate . . .

Assistant Professor Patricia Sykes said, "I thought in the beginning Bush was doing better than Dukakis, and then the tide turned somewhere in the middle and I don't know if Bush got tired or what, but he started sweating and getting nervous, and Dukakis seemed to get more energy.

"It may have helped Dukakis — I keep thinking about when he was asked about his passion. He didn't exactly succeed in conveying passion, but I think he did come off as little more energetic.

"I don't think [Dukakis] came up with a slogan, or a catchy phrase, but he did try to speak in simpler terms about some of the things that may have resonated with people, besides the American dream and that sort of thing."

Assistant Professor Patricia Sykes

Assistant Professor James Der Derian

"I think [Dukakis] was right to call George Bush on that whole issue of card-carrying. There are some words that have a connotation beyond the surface, and clearly card-carrying is one of them.

On the debate . . .

As a spectacle [the debate] was not a great event. I don't think that it had the fireworks we were expecting.

"There was nothing spectacular — there were no real goof-ups or great revelations of character or intelligence. They both displayed confidence, they both displayed some humor. They're certainly not going to win any awards for thinking on their feet.

"I think the media now has become so self-conscious about their ability to influence public opinion, that no matter who won the debate, they would rather see it kind of even.

Center advises women on how to avoid rape

By ELAYNE OTT
Collegian Correspondent

Women walking alone at night face multiple dangers but there are ways to prepare against a possible attack, according to the Everywoman's Center.

Current Federal Bureau of Investigation statistics show one out of four women will be the victim of a completed rape and one out of two will be a victim of attempted rape. 60 percent of all rape victims will know their attackers.

Although many crimes cannot be prevented, there are several tactics available that may help women hold their own in potentially dangerous situations, said Iris Garcia, coordinator for the Counselor/Advocate at EWC.

If a woman feels physically threatened, she should not be afraid to make a scene or to scream loudly to deter her attacker, Garcia said.

"It's better to be careful than to be polite. It's acceptable not to answer a question or acknowledge a request from a stranger," she said.

"A rapist is looking for someone who looks vulnerable, who looks easy to overpower," Garcia said. "Non-assertive body language is one clue to whether or not a woman is vulnerable."

Garcia said assertive body language involves walking with healthy strides and keeping your head up and shoulders straight.

"Never look down and walk as if you have a definite destination," she said.

When passing people on the street, it is important to maintain eye-contact, Garcia said. "Looking people in the eye lets them know that you aren't going to be easily overpowered," she said.

"Stay well away from bushes or densely wooded areas and stick to well-lit streets. Walk against traffic, don't give anyone a chance to sneak up on you," she said.

Simple items such as keys or pens may be used as self-defense weapons to disable or fend off an attacker, Garcia said. Carrying a whistle on a keychain or on a wrist cord can help a victim call for help, she said.

Garcia advised against using a Walkman radio at night because the music decreases the ability to hear and prevents a person from fully surveying the surroundings.

Women should also use the buddy system and take advantage of the University of Massachusetts Student Escort Service to reduce danger in potentially threatening situations, she said.

Rally protesting Contra aid slated for SU steps tomorrow

By ED REYNOLDS
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts students and members of the five college community will rally against Contra aid tomorrow on the Student Union steps.

The rally, scheduled for noon, is being held in anticipation of the upcoming vote in the US House of Representative on $27 million in 'humanitarian aid' to the Nicaraguan Contras. The outcome of the vote will have an effect on prospects for peace in Central America as well as upcoming elections.

Steven Duplisea, charirman of the Organization for Marxist Studies, said, "The spirit of the rally is money for tuition, not for ammunition." He referred to Contra Aid as a "failed policy for six years" responsible for 'murdering women, children and non-combatants'

W. Greg Rothman, spokesman for the Republican Club, had no plans for a counter-rally but said he did have some "tough questions for the people holding the rally" and hinted at a "silent demonstration for the people of Nicaragua." He said he doesn't want to see a 'Soviet beachhead and . . puppet deferment in Nicaragua.

Duplisea, who taught in Nicaragua, said Nicaragua is "no threat to Texas," and the US government is using the same logic as they did in Vietnam.

Planned speakers at the rally include members of the student body, faculty, staff and members of the five college community, some of whom have recently returned from Nicaragua. There will be music, poetry, street theatre and effigies of personalities involved in the Iran-Contra scandal.

To whom it may concern

Mort, Oprah, Phil and other syndicated horrors

Just before last semester ended I was talking to a friend who said she couldn't wait to go home. "Why?" I asked. "What can you do at home that you can't do here?"

"Nothing," she said. "I'll be bored. But, there'll be cable T.V."

Bob Bobala

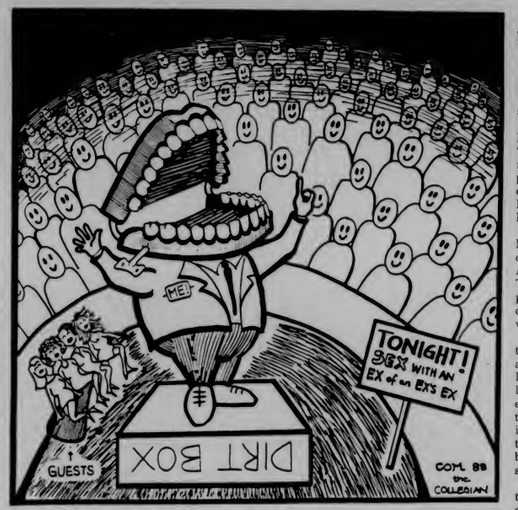
Originally I scoffed at her remark. But while I was home this summer I decided to check out the tube to see what I could get out of it. Since I don't have the patience to sit through many sitcoms, and court shows about divorces and petty offenses just don't thrill me, I decided to check out some of the talk shows.

Now these discussion shows seemed like a good idea to me. I thought they would be composed of intelligent people voicing their opinions in a public forum. I thought it would be like the undergraduate student senate (that's a joke). Talk shows appeared to be good for people outside the university community.

Before this summer, I can honestly say I had never watched the Phil Donahue Show in its entirety. I had always heard about him and I had seen skits imitating him on Saturday Night Live. Needless to say, I was terribly excited to finally sit down and watch his show. My mind was ready to be stimulated. It wanted to think about an important issue. I wanted to gain new insight. I wanted to learn.

I turned on Donahue, and what was his topic? "First sexual experience." Now, is this Donahue at his best?! I guess the topic was stimulating, but not in the way I had expected. Please tell me he is better than that.

I switched the channel to Oprah Winfrey and what did I get? "Sex over sixty."



I tried Geraldo — the guy who flopped when he opened Al Capone's vault on live T.V. only to find a couple of bottles — but his topic of "women who can't say no" wasn't much better.

Then I watched Morton Downey, Jr. — the new king of shock T.V. He is. At least they put this guy on the tube after the kids are in bed. He's a bully and basically an all around jerk — not the type of guy I'd want to have as my next door neighbor. I don't know why people go on his show. All he does is embarrass them if they don't support his point of view.

When I watch his show I want to blow his head off with a sawed-off shotgun. But then I see him on Nightline and say, "Gee, he seems like such a nice guy."

I do the same thing with both Bush and Dukakis. I hear them speak and I think, "they're both nice guys." It's too bad niceness isn't a qualification for the presidency. I still don't want to see either of them in the White House. Maybe when I vote in November I'll write Morton Downey's name in on the ballot.

I guess the only thing I can say about Morton Downey's show, or Donahue, or any other talk show is that they are what Americans find entertaining today. They're ratings have soared, which just proves that if you have a hot topic, like sex, or if you yell at people, Americans will watch your show.

The saddest thing about these shows is that people will watch them thinking they are going to be informed and enlightened, like I thought I would be. Pretty soon shows like Nightline and 60 Minutes will be pushed off the air and people will turn to Morton Downey, Jr. to find out what's going on in the world. It's one thing if people watch these shows for entertainment, but it becomes a problem if people watch these shows for anything more.

There is one thing I've learned from all this. I figure there's no reason to pursue a career or even to pursue my education any further. If a big mouth like good ol' Mort can make six figures a week, all I need to do is start stretching my vocal chords and get into syndication.

Music to my ears

CAMBRIDGE — Somewhere between partying Friday and studying Sunday, I found a way to take the trip to Harvard Saturday to watch the football team take on the Crimson.

Now, that in itself isn't interesting.

What was interesting was that sometime between the close first half play and the blowout in the second half, a little magic walked onto the field.

David R. Mark

The snobbish Harvard announcer proclaimed the entrance of the oft-famed (though oft-off-tuned is more appropriate) Harvard University band.

The crowd collectively went to the bathroom.

But earlier the crowd was on its feet, clapping vigorously at our UMass marching band.

I like our band.

At the Harvard game, I was lucky enough to be sitting on the UMass side, behind the band-members and baton-twirlers. Because sitting behind this powerful bunch I was able to see how much work goes into the 'power and class' of New England.

There are those from Harvard with a casual eye. To them comes casual amazement. "Oh yes, they're the band. They've been trained to step this way and that," they said.

But I know better.

With my keen UMass knowledge the Haardvarks (you try to ridicule their name) didn't have, I knew to sit up close. Because of my proximity, I was able to see a fairly minute female drum major bark out the command "DETAIL," to the chagrin of the troops who promptly prepared for the opening number.

A beautiful performance.

Out of the corner of my eye I saw a Haardvark clarinetist's jaw drop.

Then quickly, throngs of brass flew past this dumfounded expression. Everyone knew what to do, where to turn, what to play.

I marvelled at the drummers. Watching them — beat, beat, a beat here, and a quick beat, one, two, four, three, back, forth, and again — I could only make comparisons to the inner-workings of a watch.

It was a simple performance — a simple performance of complex movements — all flowing like honey.

I like our band.

For those who haven't seen it, I recommend it highly.

Unfortunately I'm unable to describe in words the beauty that comes from the 200 or so individuals who combine with such ease that first-time watchers are in awe.

Unfortunately I'm unable to describe the force behind the clapping and yelling in the audience immediately following a UMass marching band performance.

Certainly it's not the most important issue facing students today. Certainly there are students who have not, and never will see our band.

But with a home game against Boston University Saturday, I think it would be great to fill the stadium and applaud one of the best things about the University of Massachusetts.

I like our band.

You will too.

They said it. . .

The first question [of the debate] dealt with drug use, and Bush said he thought the main solution to the problem was to instill "values in the schools."

Dukakis, in his rebuttal, took the opportunity to criticize the Reagan administration's relations with Gen. Manuel Antonio Noriega, the Panamanian leader who has been indicted in the United States on drug trafficking charges.

"Values begin at the top," Dukakis said, and the Reagan administration was wrong to have close connections "with a drug-running Panamanian dictator."

Bush said both he and Dukakis received intelligence briefings recently and suggested that Dukakis had been told that, until the general was indicted by two federal grand juries in Florida last winter, "there was no evidence that Mr. Noriega was involved with drugs."

"Seven administrations were dealing with Mr. Noriega," Bush said. "It was the Reagan-Bush administration that brought this man to justice."

After 12 days, Chambers wrong for NE president

Dean Chambers, in what some are calling an act of moral and political desperation, has re-entered student politics and is running for the position of Northeast Area Government president. What scares me is that people may actually be listening to what this guy is saying.

Chambers says in campaign literature that he has three years of Government experience to offer the residents of Northeast. The majority of those years were at his former schools, University of Maine and Cape Cod Community College. Chambers has lived in the Northeast Area Government a total of 12 days and has never participated in Northeast Area Government on any level.

Chambers touts an impressive record of experience in Southwest Area Government, notably the Southwest Assembly. According to Southwest Area Government attendance records, Dean Chambers attended only six meetings during his entire tenure in the Fall and Spring semesters of 1987-88.

Chambers feels his opponents are lacking in Student Government Associaton (SGA) experience, stressing his membership on important committees. SGA records verify that Senator Chambers was removed from the SGA Budgets Committee in a motion that alluded to his excessive absences and alleged breaking of committee confidence. SGA meeting minutes verify that during the Spring 1988 semester there was a motion to remove Senator Chambers from the SGA, a motion to censure Senator Chambers and two recall elections for Senator Chambers' seat over his alleged involvement in a slander campaign against former Republican Club colleague W. Matthew Whiting.

Chambers declares in his literature that he is a candidate for 'equal opportunity.' In a recent confrontation with one of his opponents, John Dunlap, (co-candidate for NEAG president with Mars Ibrahim), Chambers referred to Dunlap/Ibrahim's promise to fight racial discrimination and violence on campus as 'communist brainwashing.'

My hope is that we take very seriously the responsibility of electing our peers to leadership positons. Part of that responsibility is being sure that we have all of the facts. Chambers has sidestepped the facts.

ARTS/LIVING

Grid exhibit at Gallery

The University Gallery is currently exhibiting a unique show featuring lithography, minimalism and various other grid artwork pieces. Grids: Selections from the Permanent Collection will be shown until Oct. 19th. Names such as Sol LeWitt, Jennifer Bartlett and Mel Bochner appear under the pieces.

For the avid "gridder," creations like LeWitt's "Art and Lines"— three etchings where bi-colored lines, arcs and shapes symbolize the endless combinations for primary vocabulary— decorate the gallery walls. For the beginner admirer, Chuck Close's "Keith, Four Times" is quite interesting, consisting of four lithographs of "Keith" increasing in size as you look left to right.

Many of the grid were purchased from the National Endowment for the Arts in Washington D.C. or other art organizations. Others were brought to the gallery by the UMass Alumni Association, the Alpha Phi Omega Fund, or by the artists themselves.

One piece receiving a lot of praise is Frank Stella's "Steller's Albatross of 1977." It features expressive organic and french-curve shapes over everyday graph paper as a contrast of precision and impulse.

However, the most exciting piece on exhibit in this reporter's eyes is John Buck's untitled piece from 1982. A skeleton-like body superimposes a celestial backing with quarter moons and clusters of stars. Red rectangles outline the entire "image."

The Gallery is open weekdays except Monday from 11 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. and weekends from 2 to 5 p.m.

Velvet Jesus is back; Vestrymen play Katina's

By COSMO MACERO JR.
Collegian Staff

Here's the lowdown on Local Vocals: Velvet Jesus is officially back! They'll be playing at Hampshire College on Saturday, Oct. 8th with the Bags, one of Boston's best heavy rock bands. Also, look for a special Monday night all-ages show at L'Oasis sometime in the near future.

Remember the Vestrymen? Sure you do. This UMass/Amherst College cooperative musical effort has been around for awhile now. Another of the many highlights from last Spring's pyramids concert, they'll play Katina's Thursday night, second on the bill behind Shake The Faith. Once again, Strong Waters has given birth to a new band. Damon Reeves, ex-SW lead guitarist, takes his Fantastic Four quartet to the Hatch tomorrow night. Before you head to the Hatch, check out Rock-n-Roll, A Search For God in the Campus Center room 911. This interesting, amusing, and sometimes eerie look at rock lyrics plays every semester, and its worth a look. By all means, don't take it too seriously.

Blast from the past: Human Sexual Response . . . now re-developed into The Zulus, will play Sheehan's Friday night. Recently voted Boston's best band (in some nameless poll), The Zulus, without question are at least the most original band to come along in awhile. Keep an eye out for some spacey guitar work, tortured vocals, and astonished audience members.

Also, look out for Missing Cat this weekend at the Hatch.

Catch the semester's first Comedy Night tonight at the Hatch. Student and other local comedians will be spotlighted every Tuesday at the Commuter Area Government-sponsored show. All Hatch shows are free.

Other upcoming Hatch shows include the Fantastic Four on Wednesday; Missing Cat on Friday, Sept. 30; Curtis T. and the Kick on Oct. 4; Outskirts on Oct. 5; Edgemere on Oct. 6; and Pale Nephews on Oct. 7.

"He had to make the decision to either bust his ass or fold his tent," Reid said. "And he did it on his own. After that game, he took a back seat for a few games and then emerged. He's found his niche."

Mitchell has played a big role on an offense that has carried the burden for the Minutemen so far this season.

"Chip has great heart," UMass quarterback Dave Palazzi said. "He's fast and smart and he's come a long way."

"We've kicked his butt in the last year because the talent wasn't coming out," Reid said. "He's grown up a lot."

It may have taken time, but Mitchell acquired the speed he needed. And now he's acquired a sense of satisfaction on the field.

Sports Notice

The University of Massachusetts intramural office has announced that entries are due today for the following six intramural sports:

For more information, drop by the Intramural Office, 215 Boyden, or call 5-2693 or 5-0022.

After tonight's match the Minutewomen will hit the road for three games against George Washington University, St. Bonaventure, and Penn State Universities.

The offense has been good but not great in the first six games. This matchup could be a good time to tune up that offense before the ODU game.

"We need to work on coming down our right side," Hixon said. "We've played the last couple of games really working the ball down our left. That's fine against some weaker teams but field hockey is played better right to left than left to right."

Men's tennis cancelled again

By JIM CUMMINGS
Collegian Correspondent

Yesterday's scheduled men's tennis match and the entire season thus far can be summed up in one word — cancelled.

For the third time in four matches the team found themselves practicing instead of playing. Central Connecticut State University backed out of yesterday's match and asked for it to be rescheduled for this Friday.

"We could have taken a forfeit and got the win but we look forward to playing them every year and that's not the kind of win we want," said UMass coach Manny Roberts.

Roberts is convinced the lack of competitive playing time the team has received prior to traveling to the New England Tournament last weekend was very damaging. UMass managed to win only two of eight singles matches.

Seniors Brian Gable and Humberto Soto both grabbed opening round victories but were eliminated in the second. Gable was hurt during his opening match, as he further strained his shoulder. His 6-4, 6-4 loss forced him and partner Joe Desormiers to drop out of their planned doubles match.

UMass' next match is scheduled for Wednesday against Boston University on the upper Boyden courts.

UMass' Chip Mitchell is pulling the switch

By MATT GERKE
Collegian Staff

After watching him play football as a youngster, Clifton Mitchell felt his son, Chip, didn't have the speed to be a running back or a receiver, and prepared him to become a lineman.

It was one case where father didn't know best.

Chip Mitchell has proven his father wrong in this case and become a fine tailback and, most recently, split end for the University of Massachusetts football team.

"My dad told me I wasn't fast enough to be a back or a receiver and he was ready to put me on the line," Mitchell said.

UMass can be thankful he didn't. Chip's father proceeded to work with his son, teaching him not just football but overall fitness.

"My dad got me involved in Pop Warner when I was in second grade," Mitchell said. "He worked with me a lot, teaching me about stretching and lifting."

Chip Mitchell has provided plenty of thrills for the University of Massachusetts football team as a split end this season.

The work paid off when Chip was highly recruited as a back out of Willingboro High School in Willingboro, N.J. An injury in his senior year hampered him, and it came down to UMass and the University of Delaware competing for his services.

"I went down to Delaware and I was set on going there," the junior said. "But I watched some films and, to be honest, I didn't like their offense."

"I knew George Barnwell [then a senior tailback and UMass co-captain] and he was real honest with me. UMass seemed like the better place for me and it has been. I fell in love with it. There's no way I'd go to Delaware now and I'm looking forward to playing them, personally."

Mitchell looks forward to every game now, which is a reflection on the success he's had this season. After two years of spot play behind tailback Kevin Smellie, Mitchell made the switch this season to split end.

To say the least, the transition has gone smoothly.

"I see that [split end] is the position for me," Mitchell said. "I didn't get to make as many big plays as a tailback."

Mitchell has been involved in plenty of big plays this season. Saturday against Harvard, he had six catches for 135 yards and a touchdown, returned a kickoff 69 yards, and added a 30-yard run.

"Chip really believes in himself and that allows him to make the big play," UMass head coach Jim Reid said.

But in Mitchell's 14 years of football, it may have been a game last season which contributed most to his growth as a player.

When the Minutemen faced the University of Connecticut in the sixth game of the 1987 season, Mitchell got a chance to play a major role as a tailback — and fumbled three times.

"He hurt us really bad in that game," Reid said. "But I'll tell you something, you can't be mad at Chip Mitchell becasue he doesn't have a nasty bone in his body."

But for Mitchell, who was used to contributing to a team, much less not hurting it, this was a new situation.

"That game hurt me," Mitchell says.

"It absolutely shocked him," Reid said. "He came to my office the next day and literally broke down."

It could have been the end of a career, had Mitchell been any less tough. But he gave himself an ultimatum.

"I said either this is it and I'm not going to be playing anymore, or I'm going to bounce back and contribute to this team," he said.

Minutewomen returning to home sweet home

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

It has been a long time since the University of Massachusetts field hockey team has played a game at Totman Field, 17 days to be exact.

During that time, the Minutewomen played four games on the road and one at Springfield College, which was designated as a home game.

They went 5-0 on that trip, took over first place in the Atlantic 10 East Divison, were named as the top team in New England, and were ranked as the No. 5 team in country by the NCAA.

A pretty succesful road trip, indeed. But the Minutewomen will be happy to return home today for a 3:30 p.m. encounter with Yale University.

"We're happy to be home," UMass coach Pam Hixon said. "Traveling is incredibly weary."

Yale is not ranked in the top seven teams in New England, but that could be cause for a little caution, as Yale will have nothing to lose by taking a few chances in this game.

"They have an excellent goaltender," Hixon said. "And I think what we have to be careful of is that we don't take them too lightly. The worst thing you can do to an opponent is not to respect them and that's the one thing we have to do against a team like this is respect their ability. They are a Division I program."

This will be the first of two home games that UMass will play this week at Totman. Friday, the Minutewomen will play what is shaping up to be the game of the year when they meet Old Dominion University for a 3 p.m. start.

ODU is the No. 2 team in the nation. Yale could serve as a stepping stone to Friday's game.

"It is better that we play this week rather than have a week off before we play Old Dominion," Hixon said. "Because I think you can always work on things under game pressure. "

Women's x-country tops Chiefs

By MEG QUINN
Collegian Staff

A sea of red.

That's the way University of Massachusetts women's cross country coach Julie LaFreniere described her team at the start of Saturday's race against Springfield College.

As soon as the starting gun was fired, the Minutewomen, clad in obnoxiously intimidating bright red uniforms, charged into the front pack, leaving most of the Springfield competitors behind, and went on to win with a score of 20 points to Springfield's 39.

"They did exactly what I asked," LaFreniere said. "They went out hard and got the job done. They were aggressive."

Springfield's Martha Grinell won the race in 18:32, setting a new course record. However, she was the only Springfield runner to place in the top six positions.

UMass was led by Shana Smith, who crossed the line in 18:59, followed by Laura LaVallee in 19:09. A solid pack of Minutewomen finishing close behind were Precious Hill in 19:23, Kristen Peers in 19:25 and Amy St. Pierre in 19:29.

With only 30 seconds separating Smith and St. Pierre, LaFreniere said the top five look "nice and tight." Rounding off the top nine for UMass were Cathy Crocker, Lynn Kirchoff, Kathy Holt and Anna Montouri.

LaFreniere was especially pleased to defeat Springfield because the two times UMass faced the team last year, Springfield beat the Minutewomen.

LaFreniere feels this win will give her team confidence after last week's loss to powerhouses Yale and Boston College.

"There's a big difference between the two meets," she said. "They did a tremendous job. If they keep this attitude up, we should place in the top four at the New Englands."

Volleyball to entertain Brown Bruins tonight

By RONN GARRY

The University of Massachusetts volleyball team is on a roll, it has won all eight of its matches thus far and now it can fine-tune its engine against Brown University tonight (7 p.m.) in Totman Gymnasium.

Although the Bruins are only 2-2, they have already downed one Atlantic 10 opponent — St. Bonaventure University, UMass' second A-10 match.

Senior Juliet Primer and the Minutewomen will play host to Brown University tonight.

Brown has also beat Fordham University this year but lost to Syracuse University and Providence College.

Last year, Brown shocked the Minutewomen in their first meeting but UMass returned the favor in the second match by pounding the Bruins in three games.

UMass will begin its A-10 schedule this week, and tonight's match against the Bruins will be a measuring point for how well they must play for the rest of the season, since Brown already beat the Bonnies.

Although they lost one of their top players, the Bruins present some very special problems for UMass.

"They are a very good defensive team, very similar to Princeton," who brought UMass to five games on Friday, UMass coach Carol Ford said.

However, the Minutewomen have been virtually unstoppable throughout their first eight games.

"I'm real happy with the way things are going," Ford said.

UMass swept five games at the Colgate Tournament this past weekend but Ford said she still sees room for improvement.

"We want to work on some things that we didn't do this weekend," Ford said.

The offense, she said, will be working on more complex principals than it has in the recent matches. The Minutewomen want to improve their passing and their faking of some kills, in order to hold the defensive players in their blocks.

Owning most of the responsibilities on offense will be junior setter, Karen Ferguson, who along with senior Julie Smith had their best matches of the year this past weekend, according to Ford.

Ferguson will be trying to get the ball to a front line of Smith, Barbara Meehan, Juliet Primer, and Karen Ferguson, which has performed even better than expected this year.

BOG space allocation causes anger from RSOs

By GEORGE FRANCY
Collegian Staff

Several student groups are set to appeal changes of office space made by the Board of Governors last week.

The board Thursday moved Spectrum magazine to Student Union room 322 with the Minuteman newspaper and Students for Bush. Graduate Student Organizations and Abilities Unlimited also were moved to Campus Center 103. Also part of the move was an allocation of space for the Third World Caucus in Student Union 404 with the Commuter Area Government.

Board members Jay Festa, of the Commuter Area Government, and Riti Sachdeva, of the Third World Caucus, engineered the move. Festa said he and Sachdeva wrote the motion Thursday afternoon, but he had been working on the motion before he wrote it.

The groups that will protest the changes include Spectrum, the yearbook Index, WMUA, and the Graduate Student Organizations.

Representatives from each of these bodies will appear before the board's executive committee to appeal the changes.

Spectrum was the first to announce that they will appeal. Charles Francis Carroll, co-managing editor of Spectrum, said the publication was preparing a twentieth anniversary issue, and this move would be very damaging to the endeavor.

"If we have to move into that space with the Minuteman, that's it, that's the end of Spectrum. I don't believe it's the role of the Board of Governors to effectively kill Spectrum magazine. We may be able to put out this issue, but that would be it," Carroll said.

Carroll has been critical of conservatives in the past. He said after an article he wrote in 1985 titled "The rise and fall of the new right" was printed in the Index, he and Spectrum became the recipients of much harassment. Carroll could not say for sure, but he believed the harassment came from conservative factions on campus.

He said the new space Spectrum was being moved into is unacceptable because of the other occupants of the room and the room's size. "It's like a toilet," Carroll said.

Festa said he had not consulted with Spectrum before proposing the move, but had chosen the location because of proximity to Student Government Association Communications, which has facilities Spectrum needs.

WMUA's Scott Lever is also unhappy with the moves. Lever said he had an understanding that the officers of the BOG would consider the radio station for the office if Spectrum moved out.

"The need for space has always been there, and space has never been available," Lever said.

Spectrum's current office is behind WMUA. Lever said this would have been ideal because the radio station could not move its equipment around. "They didn't look at any of these considerations," Lever said, "They didn't do any research."

The BOG maintains a Space Committee, which annually reviews office space and makes allocations based on what is available and who is most in need. Lever said it was wrong for this process to be ignored.

Eric Goldman, photo editor of the Index, said his group had also been trying to get more space.

"It bothers me that all these groups came in . . . and didn't follow the proper procedures," Goldman said.

Tom Hutcheson, vice president of the Graduate Student Senate, also was concerned that the normal channels had been ignored. Hutcheson said the GSS was drafting a motion to ask the BOG to repeal the Festa/Sachdeva motion.

State has benefits under Duke

BY JOHN KING
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — Michael Dukakis' claim to competence, and to the presidency, rests in large measure with the quality of life in Massachusetts under his stewardship. Whether by luck or leadership, the statistics say the rebound was real, and in some ways dramatic, for a state whose economy had been sputtering along at bottom.

"He was sitting there in the corner office, " says a prominent Boston business economist in addressing the tricky Dukakis with what the governor likes to call the "Massachusetts Miracle".

Housing costs are astronomical, prison conditions are deplorable and Boston Harbor is an environmental embarrassment, yet by most measures — jobs and income taxes and crime, health and education — life has improved in Massachusetts during the years since Dukakis took charge.

Per capita income of $19,142, far above the national average.

A jobless rate of 3.2 percent, far below the national average.

More than 400,000 new jobs in five years, most of them "good jobs, at good wages," as Dukakis likes to brag.

Violent crime down almost 13 percent, the lowest rate among the large industrial states.

The nickname "New Appalachia" was pinned on Massachusetts in the 1970s. Recessions in 1970 and 1973-75 sent the jobless rate to 12 percent in some areas of the state.

The state's biggest problem then was the exodus south of traditional mill-based industries that had supported the state since the Industrial Revolution - shoes, textiles and paper. There was no high-tech then, no place for laid-off workers to turn. "New Appalachia" fought "Taxachusetts" for prominence; the state's tax burden then was among the highest in the nation. It is now below the national average.

The governor counts among his greatest achievements an Employment Training program that has helped move more than 52,000 people into jobs and 75 percent of them off welfare over the last five years; a plan to guarantee health insurance to virtually every Massachusetts worker by 1990, and one of the nation's premier tax enforcement systems.

Those and other successful program have, like the governor himself, benefited from a hot economy, which has allowed Dukakis to dramatically expand state services and social programs while still cutting taxes.

But his stewardship has not been without problems. Massachusetts has one of the nation's most crowded prison systems, has just begun cleaning up Boston Harbor, has had two recent personnel scandals in its public higher education system and currently faces a critical shortage of workers and affordable housing - both byproducts of the boom. Republican opponent George Bush likes to call the Massachusetts Miracle the Massachusetts Mirage.

Presidency to be voted on

Senate meets this evening

By ERIN ABBEY
Collegian Staff

Whether co-presidents-elect Shari Silkoff and Jason Rabinowitz can officially take office may again cripple the Undergraduate Student Senate tonight when it meets for the first time this semester.

The proposal to approve the co-presidents-elect is attached to a proposal to approve the Coordinating Committee minutes. The coordinating committee acts as the senate during the summer months. The senate, however, has to vote on whether to approve the committee's actions.

At issue is whether the SGA bylaws and constitution allow two people to hold the office of president. The case has gone before the Student Supreme Court, which said the co-presidents could not take office until the case had its final hearing.

Speaker of the Senate Robert Fadel said, "Undoubtedly the main issue is going to be the approval of the Coordinating Committee minutes."

Senator Brian Crawford said, "It's going to be hell. It's assumed people will attempt to filibuster and slow the process."

In previous senate meetings senators requested roll call votes, in which the speaker of the senate calls the senators' names to check if they are present and have quorum. In doing this, the co-president issue is postponed.

Fadel said he hopes the senate comes together and votes one way or another on the issues.

Senator Todd Lever said, "I hope we can get through the co-president issue so we can deal with other important issues."

Medal stripping upsets Canada

TORONTO (AP) — Ben Johnson, the Toronto sprinter who elated Canadians by winning the 100-meter dash at the Olympics, again drew an outpouring of emotion from his adopted land after he was stripped of his gold medal for using drugs.

"It outs a dent in Canada," said Scott Shaw, a 10th grader in Calgary, Alberta.

Canadians watched the Jamaican-born Johnson shoot to a 9.79 -second world record in the 100-meter race Saturday and win Canada its first gold medal in Seoul.

But today, a disappointed nation awaited the return of the burly sprinter after a urine sample was found to contain traces of anabolic steroids Johnson, who was disqualified from the Olympic Games on Monday and stripped of the gold medal, was to return to Toronto yesterday afternoon.

Prime Minister Brian Mulroney, who Saturday thanked Johnson for the "thrill of a lifetime" in a nationally-televised telephone call to Seoul, said his disqualification was "a moment of great sorrow for all Canadians".

Calling the incident "a national embarrassment," Sports Minister Jean Charest said Johnson will be banned from Canada's national team for life.

"A few days ago, Canada had the opportunity of having a great day of national pride," Charest told reporters. He said his government accepted the validity of the tests and the suspension would be effective pending an appeal from Johnson.

Hub takes new med waste steps

BOSTON (AP) — After piles of medical waste were discovered illegally dumped on two consecutive days, the city's code enforcement director said Tuesday that emergency steps for dealing with medical waste will be imposed this week.

"There's going to be some temporary emergency provisions relative to the disposal of medical waste," Richard Ianella said. "I can promise you that will happen within the next couple of days."

The provisions would include tougher penalties against those who dump medical waste improperly and a system of disposal to help combat the recent rise in illegal disposal of syringes, needles and surgical gear that Ianella attributes to the demand for landfill space and rising cost of disposal.

"We've been doing this job for three years and the first time in three years that (medical waste) came out was over the summer," Iannella said. "What people were doing with the stuff prior to that I don't know, but it is very costly to dispose of."

Ianella said the cost of disposing of solid waste has risen from $20 a ton four years ago to about $100 a ton today, and that the cost of medical waste disposal has also skyrocketed. The cost of disposing of a one-by-two foot box of medical waste is about $75, Ianella said.

"The biggest problem is with cleaning companies that go into a doctor's or a veterinarian's office and instead of disposing of it properly, they're just taking the attitude that we'll throw it in the with solid waste," Ianella said.

"It's going to be a problem that's going to continue unless the commonwealth assists all municipalities with easing the landfill space crunch," Ianella said. "As the space gets more scarce, we're going to keep having these problems."

Co-presidents-elect discuss battle toward ratification

By DAVID R. MARK
Collegian Staff

Shari Silkoff and Jason Rabinowitz, Undergraduate Student Senate co-presidents-elect, said last night they hoped to be ratified at tonight's Senate meeting after a long battle with the former Student Attorney General and a contingent of filibustering senators.

Silkoff and Rabinowitz, appearing on the WMUA radio show "SGA Today," also expressed hope that they could continue their dialogue with both the University administration and state and federal governments, and fill the vacuum created since former SGA President Joe Demeo left office April 1.

"My guess is we'll be ratified by the full Senate within two weeks," said Rabinowitz. "If it comes to a vote, we'll get elected," he said.

Last Spring, former Attorney General Bill Collins gave an advisory opinion that the SGA constitution prohibited two people from holding the president's office. Rabinowitz and Silkoff won the popular vote in a March election, and Collins requested an injunction to bar the co-presidents-elect from taking office.

After three hearings to determine if co-presidents could take office, the Student Judiciary placed a restraining order against the Senate to prevent the election results.

On June 8, the Coordinating Committee, which takes on the responsibility of the Senate over the summer, ratified the election with the stipulations that Silkoff and Rabinowitz could not be on payroll and could have no assistants until ratification by the full Senate.

Rabinowitz said the road to ratification "doesn't make sense, except if you take into consideration the political implications of our being elected."

"Two-thirds of the body supported us (last semester), but because Robert's Rules of Order has a lot of parts to it, there are a lot of ways two or three senators can delay the process by hours, weeks, months even," he said.

Collins called the radio show and asked why Silkoff and Rabinowitz "(have) gone around telling people they're presidents of the SGA when the judiciary has a restraining order against them taking office. Don't they believe in the SGA constitution?"

Silkoff replied, "We are in office and we are doing the job, what you call us is up to you."

Another caller asked if Rabinowitz would prevent the military and the CIA from recruiting on campus.

"The Board of Governors makes decision regarding the CIA," said Rabinowitz. "I will respect the Board's decision."

Regarding the military, Rabinowitz said that if they discriminate, "they should not be allowed to use our facilities for recruitment."

The military has been cited in the past as discriminating based on sexual orientation.

Silkoff and Rabinowitz said they have begun to work on numerous issues, among them the Oct. 27 Civility Day, advocating for the Legal Services Center, and an investigation into the price of books at the Textbook Annex, and whether those prices could be lowered through a state subsidy.

"Part of what we're doing now is trying to make an impact in the Statehouse, the White House, and on this campus. It's very important," said Silkoff. "We've got the administration talking — we're working together for the common goal of getting a better education at this University."

Rabinowitz added, "We've lost momentum because of infighting — this is why we ran, with United Student Agenda — we have a broad coalition of people who agree we need a quality education free of racism and discrimination. In March 1989 the SGA will have a much better reputation — at least that's what we hope to do."

New parking lot to be built in SW

Decision sparks controversy over recreational field

A new parking lot is going to be built in the Southwest Residential Area across from the basketball courts.

Director of the Physical Plant Roger Cherewatti said the new parking lot will contain approximately 250 spaces and construction should begin in a couple of weeks.

The area, which is located near the Southwest Playing Fields, is often used for athletics by residents of Southwest.

On a fair weather day groups of people can be seen playing football, softball, and frisbee, among others. During the winter, the area has been the sight of many snow football games.

Alex Zarganes, co-president of Southwest Area Government, expressed concern over the building of the parking lot. He said it would take away the recreational space from the students and add more unnecessary concrete to the area.

Jonathan Grant, co-president of SWAG, said the area is utilized by everyone in Southwest and there really no replacement for it.

"You can't use the intramural fields the same way," he said. "Besides, it's a furious hike."

Odds and ends

Sometimes you pray they'd just go away

I hadn't been here two weeks before it happened. I was sitting on the Student Union steps, minding my own business, when someone came up to me and asked if I knew Jesus.

Brian Jewell

Taken by surprise, I murmured something like, "Um, yeah," which was all the encouragement he needed. He proceeded to rattle off his spiel, while I tried to think of some way to get rid of him.

After a minute he paused, and I said, "I don't want to have this conversation."

This was apparently too subtle for him, because he kept talking, even as I did my best to ignore him. What do I have to do, I thought, hit you over the head with a cathedral?

Finally I sneaked a glance at him and saw he was offering me a flyer. I realized this was the end of his speech, and gratefully accepted the paper. As I took it, our eyes met.

I have seen that intense look before. Occasionally my peers have looked like that when they naively, or sometimes not naively discussed politics. I have seen that look in old women who shuffled around malls and talked to themselves. And I have seen that look in the many people who have tried to sell me Jesus (sell is the be missionaries remind me of stereo salesmen trying to sell an expensive model).

That look is a symptom of what bothers me most about these would-be missionaries. It is not the way they treat religion like a job, with a quota of souls to save. It's not that they embarrass me. It's not that I believe a person must come to a relationship with Jesus on his own. What disturbs me is what I might call their rigid thinking.

Obviously, they believe their way of worshipping God is the 'right' way, otherwise they wouldn't try to convert others. In effect the attempt to convert says 'we know God and you don't. You won't go to heaven unless you do it our way.'

Perhaps there is a 'right' way to worship, but how can we recognize it? We are dealing in mysteries, not facts. It is comforting to believe we have solved the mystery, but we will not really know the truth until we "go gentle into that good night."

In other news. . .

Memoirs out of Washington lately all seem to have an explosive revelation, the better to have a crack at the best-seller list. Lyndon Johnson's aide Richard Goodwin writes that the former President, near the end of his term, had become paranoid. Former White House Chief of Staff Donald Regan gave us Government-by-astrology; former Reagan Spokesman Larry Speakes told of making up quotes for the President. In addition, recent news stories have reminded the nation of Richard Nixon's ugly displays of anti-Semitism. Now comes Landslide: The Unmaking of the President: 1984-1988 by Reporters Jane Mayer and Doyle McManus. They reveal that many White House aides believed Ronald Reagan was so depressed and inattentive after cancer surgery and the Iran-contra affair last year that the possibility of invoking the 25th Amendment to remove him was raised in a memo to White House Chief of Staff Howard Baker.

Academic freedom is alive and well at UMass

Recently, there has been some confusion and misconceptions circulating about Julius Lester's transferral from the Afro-American department to the Judaic Studies department. There are some individuals who argue that academic freedom at UMass is a thing of the past as a result of Lester's transferral.

That's wholly off base.

Lester was not transferred, as has been argued, on the basis of his expression of thoughts and conclusions. Lester writes in his book Lovesong: Becoming a Jew that James Baldwin and Jesse Jackson expressed anti-Semitic statements, and by default are anti-Semitic (as recorded in the Boston Globe this summer). Anyone with at least a working knowledge of the philosophies expressed by both Baldwin and Jackson is aware that this characterization is ridiculous. However, when asked to debate and unequivocally prove his statements were founded, Lester declined. The unwillingness of an academic scholar to aggressively discuss and defend his or her ideas (in this instance, charges) is irresponsible and dangerous.

Regardless, Lester's opinions and activities in recent years had travelled so far outside that of the collective agenda of the Afro-American department that his unfounded charges against a moral and intellectual leader such as Baldwin produced a quite understandable final straw, hence advocacy within the department for his transferral. The intellectual direction followed by the Afro-American department, which is very much in line with black intellectuals nationwide, is a direction agreed upon within the black community. It is a direction geared toward best enhancing the standing of all blacks in American society. Lester was seen as not moving in this direction, thus his standing as a vital part of the Afro-American department deteriorated. Since Lester's contributions to the department were not seen as beneficial, it is quite understandable why those in the department would wish to see him transferred.

James Bergey

Lester's opinions were not oppressed. He was and is not prohibited from expressing them. However, his charges against Baldwin and Jackson were unfounded and quite frankly, unacceptable. Lester's unwillingness to aggressively debate and argue his case is indicative of this. So far, everyone involved with the departmental transfer, including Lester, is pleased with the outcome.

Additionally, some have argued that current black intellectual thought precludes debate on dissenting opinions. In reality, black intellectuals, which precludes the faculty of the Afro-American department, are always open to dissenting debate as long as it is responsible, intelligent and validated with facts.

What actually has been devoid of responsibility and intelligence is the manner in which blacks in this country have historically been treated by a government that continually pounded the drum of 'liberty' and 'freedom.' To this day, blacks must work twice as hard overcoming obstacles to attain positions in American society, obstacles whites never have had to face.

In an attempt to bring about change in the political system resulting in fair treatment of blacks, the black intellectual community must take stands which some whites fail to comprehend and ultimately misconstrue as 'un-American,' 'radical' or even 'dangerous.' A black like Lester, who criticizes and is criticized by an ideology which those whites fear, is one black who they find appealing. Hence their blind rush to Lester's defense without careful consideration of all the factors involved.

The guaranteeing of free and open criticism is a vital part of intellectual endeavor. Yet criticism is valid only if it is emotionally unclouded and grounded in fact. Lester's criticisms and statements were unfounded; open debate between Lester and his opponents would prove that. Academic freedom is alive and well at UMass, in the Afro-American department and the Judaic Studies department.

My observations

A lame and tame 21st birthday

Why me?

What did I do to deserve the hand that has been precariously dealt to me? I've been through the laughter, the tears, the sorrow and the pain. I'm a tormented soul that is turning 21 on a Monday. This is a fate worse than getting your cavities filled — or death (whichever the case may be).

This should be a time of joy, even inspiration. I'm legal, I can now live life in the fast lane. Only it seems that this revved engine will be running out of gas a tad early. That tawdry night of drink and decadence will be replaced with tea and cookies. Let me tell you folks; I really hate tea. But that's beside the point.

What would you do in my position? The weekend has ended, people are partied out and all my friends have come down from their Saturday cloud. They've discovered the glorious world of studying and passing their classes.

We had plans; before school started they didn't care about classes. 'We'll party all night no matter what day it is.' That's what they said. Yeah, right. I don't blame them for having to do work, but come on, most people live for this day. I'm reaching a new plateau, a turning point. Only it's a cliff and I'm about to jump. Okay, maybe I'm over-reacting.

Nancy Cohen

When they turned 21, my friends hid this fact from me and went out. Unfortunately, being the inquisitive little vixen that I am, I always found out. They'd be so proud, smugly flashing their ID's in the faces of bouncers. They could go to bars, clubs and all the happening places. Me, I'd beg and grovel for them to buy me a lousy six-pack of beer. Now I'm turning 21 and they're handing me a bloody tea-bag. Didn't I say I hate tea? I thought I did.

It's not so much the booze, drinking's fun but that's not all. You get blinded on your 21st birthday because it's a rite of passage and because you're trying to kill the spectre of the future. . . .Yes, its beyond !!!

With it comes responsibility and opening a bank account for that face-lift you'll need in ten or 20 years. Better plan early, appointments are going to be hard to come by.

I can see it now, my husband who once was a young primed stud is now sitting in his favorite Lazy-Boy swilling beer, picking lint out of his belly button and belching. Me, I'll be doing the Jane Fonda workout for the elderly, have ten kids and be watching 'All My Children' while eating Bon Bons. Occasionally I'll meander to the medicine chest to spread on the Retin-A and Oil of Olay.

This is the time you regret wishing your life away. Pretty anti-climatic, huh? Well who said life was a constant climax anyway?

Trust me folks, don't live for being older than you are, you might get your wish sooner than you think. Sorry to take all the fun out of it, but that's what I'm here for.

Tea anyone?

BOG unfair to WMUA

I condemn the Board of Governors motion passed Thursday that moved Spectrum from CC 103B to SU 322 with the Minuteman and Students for Bush; and allocates CC 103B to the Graduate Student Organizations and Abilities Unlimited, and SU 404 to the Third-World Caucus.

Do the 14 governors who voted for the motion know the size of Spectrum's art racks? Did the Spectrum members know their group was considered a candidate for relocation? The answer's no, and isn't surprising since the motion was written only hours before it was passed. Had the BOG tabled the motion for a week to look into the matter, they would have realized that, for instance, WMUA paid to renovate the Spectrum space, which is adjacent to the radio station, and has waited for Spectrum to vacate it since 1984.

WMUA is crippled due to a lack of space. We need help.

With this action, the BOG sets the dangerous precedent of action on conscience and whim instead of logic and equity.

Lever said quorum, the number of senators that must attend in order for the meeting to be held, will be reduced because some senators have left their positions during the summer.

The reduction in the number of senators could play an important role in how long the debate lasts, he said.

Rabinowitz said, "My expectations are that the Coordinating Committee minutes will be approved. How long that will take, I will not even guess."

Also on the agenda is a proposal to establish an Abilities Caucus Senator and a proposal to amend the SGA constitution to read that more than two students can hold the office of president.

Hutcheson said he was not excessively pleased or displeased with the space the GSOs had been given, but took issue with the process used.

"We're not comfortable with the process by which space was allocated or the particular spaces designated for use. There was no [space committee] hearing and we think that's an abominable process."

Board Chairperson Eric Nakajima also voiced concerns about passing by the Space Committee: "I feel the more the board moves away from it's established processes, the more I think it's going to damage the board's integrity," Nakajima said.

Previously, Nakajima had orchestrated a move which had put GSOs in Student Union room 415 with Concepto Latino and the Central American Students Association. At the time, the Minuteman was in the same room, and there had been friction, including a shoving match, between members of the Minuteman and the graduate students.

Nakajima then decided to move the Minuteman to room 322 with Students for Bush. This move had been lauded because Students for Bush has a large cross-membership with the Republican Club. The Republican Club had been booted from its space at the end of last semester by the BOG because of tensions with the Lesbian, Bisexual and Gay Alliance.

Nakajima said Chancellor Joseph Duffey had also expressed interest in the escalating tensions in the Student Union. "The gist of what [Duffey] said to me was that he was concerned about the Republican Club issue," Nakajima said. He added Duffey had been interested in seeing things resolved.

Duffey could not be reached for comment.

"They've got good team speed," continued Gettler, "they're a very good team all around."

Gettler has delivered a wake up call to his troops, inserting sophmore Brett Shumsky in goal, while dropping a fullback from the starting lineup in favor of a fourth midfielder, probably freshman Brett Anthony. The shakeup is intended to beef up the Minuteman midfield, but will add extra pressure to an already stressed defensive corps.

"The biggest problems we've had have been in the midfield," said Gettler, "not that the players haven't played well, but they're always playing against more (people).

"Needless to say, we go to three backs and they're (Yale) going to test us," added Gettler. "We are going to have to be very good defenisively, or give up a lot of goals. It's a calculated risk."

Gettler will be leaning heavily on freshman Dan Lawrence to stop Cass and his speedy supporting cast, a responsibility the atheletic fullback has earned with his excellent play of late. "He's gotten better and better every game," praised Gettler. "He's tough as nails," added assistant coach John Martin.

Free Kicks: When the Minutemen do finally return to Upper Boyden Field on Saturday, they'll be welcomed by friends, family and alumni in town for the annual "Massachusetts Challenge Cup" tournament. The weekend's festivities will include games between visiting West Virginia, Siena and Boston University, as well as an alumni game and various other events. Action starts at noon, when B.U. will face Siena. The Minutemen face West Virginia at 3 p.m.

"I saw them play against Dartmouth, and they are a dangerous team for two reasons," Rudy said. "One, they have a plan, a very definite tactical plan to which the players adhere to strictly."

That plans is one that calls for defense, defense and then some more defense. The Bruins featured a style of collapse zone in which they defense nine players.

"It reminds me of the Italian team in the World Cup, Catenaccio," Rudy said. "It reminds me of that style. They play defense and then counter-attack and they do it fairly effectively."

Featured in that defense are midfielders Sara Levin and Suzanne Bailey, both of whom are very solid, according to Rudy. They've been the backbone to a team that has allowed just two goals this year.

The other fine feature of Brown's is one that nothing can change. They have size.

"They're huge. They're probably the largest women's soccer team I've ever seen in my life," Rudy said. "Interestingly, when they announce their starting lineup, they announce the player's name, number and height. They try to intimidate you."

The lineup, on paper, is intimidting. The height of the defensive line goes 5-8, 5-9, a pair of 5-10s and a 5-9 goalkeeper. That would make an interesting starting five in basketball, never mind soccer.

All this comes together to make a team that could give UMass a big run for its money.

"They play their restarts hard, they take pride in winning headers and they love to corner kick," Rudy said. "They lure you in and catch you on the counter, then they force you to foul and try to score off the restart.

"We'll have to be vigilant and attack the flanks, try to set the ball to the wide positions and be very patient," Rudy said. "To beat their pack defense we'll have to either outfinesse them — but there's not enough room for that — or on the ground or in the air. In the air is off because of their height, so we'll have to attack them on the ground and off the flanks."

The flanks had been a problem for the Minutewomen earlier this season, but hard work has helped to bring that along.

"We're doing very well. Our team adjusts very well to the things we work on," Rudy said.

Minutewomen beat Yale 3-0, remain unbeaten

Team outshoots Elis 43-2 for sixth straight shutout

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

There were no surprises at Totman Field yesterday when the University of Massachusetts field hockey team played Yale University.

The Minutewomen could have, should have, and did win yesterday's game with the Elis. The final score was 3-0.

As in its previous six games, UMass dominated the opposition outshooting Yale 43-2. It was also the sixth shutout in a row for the Minutewomen who have only given up one goal this season.

UMass upped its record to 7-0 on the season just hours after learning that the NCAA had moved them up to the No. 4 spot in the National Poll from the No. 5 ranking that it held last week.

Yale dropped to 2-3 on the year after giving the Minutewomen one of its tougher games of the year, at least scorewise. The Elis were in this game up until the waning minutes of the second half.

"I just wanted our kids to go out and be a little aggressive, and give them a little trouble, and that's exactly what they did," Yale coach Diane Moyer said. "They have some great players so I knew that some of the one-on-ones that we were going to have and some of the matchups were going to be fun."

Whoever found themselves matched up with UMass senior forward Tonia Kennedy when she received the ball probably did not have too much fun yesterday.

Kennedy burned the Elis for two goals in the first half to pave the way for the UMass defense to step in and shutdown yet another opponent.

The first of those goals came at 9:19 of the first half and the second at 21:17 to give UMass a 2-0 lead.

Kennedy now leads the Minutewomen with ten goals on the year and she was also named the Atlantic 10 player of the week for her performance last weekend.

Kennedy scored five goals last week in a pair of wins over the University of Rhode Island and Rutgers University which secured first place for the Minutewomen in the A-10 East.

Traffic got heavy in front of the net yesterday at the women's field hockey game, as the Minutewomen outshot Yale 43-2. UMass remained unbeaten and moved up the ladder in the latest polls.

One player who was very busy for Yale all afternoon was junior goaltender Sue Sabatino who walked away with 32 saves for the game.

"I thought we looked good," UMass coach Pam Hixon said. "We scored two good goals. Tonia played great, and we didn't give up anything in the first half which was really what we wanted to do. I told the team that we were definitely going to substitute at halftime so we could either have a comfortable lead at halftime or we could sweat it out through the second half."

Hixon kept her promise by gradually substituting in the bench right down the line. Senior Sue Desmond saw her first minutes of the year in the net and responded by making two saves.

One of those saves proved to be very big as Desmond made a diving stop early in the half on a Yale player who walked in alone. Had she scored, the UMass lead would have been cut to 2-1 with about 25 minutes left in the half.

With time running out on the Elis in the second half, junior forward Kathy DeAngelis added another goal for the Minutewomen to extend the lead to 3-0 at 33:42.

The win sets up a big contest on Friday when UMass takes on Old Dominion University at Totman. ODU was given the No. 1 ranking by the NCAA yesterday after it beat the University of North Carolina and the University of Maryland back-to-back on Saturday and Sunday.

UMass wins in 5, turns Brown U. black and blue

Minutewomen squeeze by for 8th straight win; GW will challenge unbeaten record on Friday

By RONN GARRY
Collegian Staff

Trailing two games to one, the University of Massachusetts volleyball team needed a comeback of Biblical proportions to down Brown University last night at the Totman Gymnasium.

Then the veterans shall lead them.

Although the entire UMass squad played outstanding, when the Minutewomen won the final three sets to beat the Bruins 14-16, 9-15, 15-10, 15-9, 15-5; junior setter Karen Ferguson and senior outside hitter Julie Smith led UMass to the promised land.

After connecting on only 12 assists in the first two games, Ferguson was the oil in the turbo-UM offense as she connected on 41 assists and seven kills in the last three frames. Smith was equally spectacular, she had a career day — crunching 20 kills past the Brown defense.

"(Last night was) the best Julie Smith has ever played, I'll bet. She was almost unstoppable," UMass coach Carol Ford said.

The entire UMass offense dominated the last three games. Sophomore Nancy Sullivan (14 kills, 5 aces), seniors Barbara Meehan (10 kills), Juliet Primer (11 kills) and Ann Marie Larese (9 kills) played in mid-season form as they dominated Brown.

The entire night wasn't so smooth for the Minutewomen however. In the first two sets, Brown was playing like mercury, the liquid — smooth, flowing, and effortless; the Minutewomen, however, were also playing like Mercury. . .the planet. They were big and clumsy, moving slowly, and going in circles.

The Bruins won the first set with the help of their version of the twin-towers. Jessica Kowal and Amy Randel, both over six feet tall, owned the Minutewomen.

Kowal was serving with the accuracy of a world-championship dart player and knocking Minutewomen blocks back as fast as they came over.

The Minutewomen were not helping their cause, however.

"In the first two games we played outstanding, but we couldn't get any serves (in). You can not win any points if you don't have the ball," Ford said.

Then the turnaround came. The crowd, about 175 strong, got behind the Minutewomen, and things began to roll.

UMass struck first, taking a 5-0 lead. They weren't able to maintain the momentum and string anymore points together as the two teams battled to a nine-all tie.

The serving Ford had talked about had finally returned, and not too soon. Sullivan had three serving aces and Primer pelted the Bruins.

"We got a whole string of points in the third game when Juliet was serving," Ford said.

With the pressure on the Minutewomen stole six of the next seven points for a 15-9 victory in the third game.

The fourth game was the most physical. Sullivan and Meehan led the set off with monsterous kills and a 2-0 lead. UMass totally dominated in the fourth, registering 19 of its 71 kills and flustering the Bruins in the process. UMass won 15-5.

Frustration must have set in on the Brown bench. UMass was in control of the fifth set from the very first points.

The Minutewomen jumped out to leads of 4-2, 8-5, and 14-5. Ferguson ended the formalities with a tip shot off the block of Kowal for the matches final point.

"I knew we could (win) it, it was just a question of if we would win it," after trailing two games to one early, Ferguson said.

"We were kind of up and down all night. We're still a little rough around the edges but that can be worked out," she said.

Last night's win gives UMass a perfect 8-0 record going into its Atlantic 10 schedule Friday. The Minutewomen will travel to George Washington University for the first of two away A-10 matches.

UMass soccer teams in action today

• Women hit the road for night game with Brown

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team begins probably its most critical stretch of the season tonight when the Minutewomen travel to Providence, R.I. to face Brown University (7 p.m.)

Tonight's contest marks the first of a lengthy, grueling stretch of games and travel which may make or break this season for UMass, now ranked fifth in the country. UMass plays every other day through next Tuesday, with the next three games on the road.

Brown also could represent what UMass coach Jim Rudy calls "our toughest test so far this season." The Bruins are currently ranked 13th in the country and are a formidable opponent indeed. Brown won its first four games, all by shutout, before losing to a tough George Mason team, 2-0 on Sunday.

The Bruins could have lost more than that in the process. The team's top scorer, Theresa Herschauer, went out with a sprained ankle and it's questionable whether she will be available tonight. Herschauer leads the team with 11 goals this year.

• Men head south to end road swing vs. Yale Elis

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Correspondent

A nasty early season schedule today finds the struggling University of Massachusetts men's soccer in New Haven, CT, where they'll find the Elis of Yale, recently ranked No. 3 in New England by Intercollegiate Soccer Association of America. Kickoff is scheduled for 3 p.m.

The Minutemen are reeling from last week's pair of road losses to Dartmouth and Vermont, efforts that saw their record sag to 3-3, and their spirits droop even lower.

"Our confidence is a little down," said UMass head coach Jeff Gettler. "Any time you lose players start to doubt themselves and their abilities."

The Elis rely on an explosively speedy offense featuring senior captian Steve Cass, and follow up with strong defense, anchored by first team All-New England sweeper Peter Dinobe. Cass is a proven scorer, capable of busting a defensive game plan with talent alone, while Dinobe rates, in the Gettler's own words, as a "great player." In their latest outing, Yale downed No. 7 nationally ranked Seton Hall by a score of 3-2, Sunday in New Haven.

Club sports

Bicycle Club starts off the season well

This past weekend, the University of Massachusetts Bicycle Club went to Central Connecticut State University for the Blue Devil Criterium race.

It was the first race for this year's new club members, Adam Homes and Erin Lynch

Lynch placed sixth in the 20 one-mile lap woman's race. Chris Cavanough placed first in the 15 lap men's C race. While David Pollock placed eight in the 25 lap men's B race.

Two team members placed in the men's A race — Homes, who came in fourth, and Greg Swinand, who came in seventh. The team came in second overall.

On Saturday Oct. 8 there will be a 16-mile time trial race on campus in the Northeast residential area. This course will be the same one used in the Eastern College Championships held in the spring.

The club encourages new people to join. Meetings are held on Tuesday's at 7:30 p.m. in the basement of Greenough dorm.

Senate fails to ratify election

By YANA DLUGY
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Student Senate last night once again failed to ratify the election of Shari Silkoff and Jason Rabinowitz as Student Government Association co-presidents.

The election results would have been ratified if the Coordinating Committee minutes were approved by the senate. The committee, which acts as the senate during the summer, installed Silkoff and Rabinowitz in June with three stipulations.

The stipulations stated that the co-presidents would hold the position without pay and abstain from all votes in the capacity of president, both pending senate approval. Also, the office would be limited to a spending cap equivalent to two months percentage of its total budget.

When the proposal to approve the committee's minutes came to the senate floor, a problem arose because of a Student Supreme Court decision in a case against the committee. SGA Senator Mary Rita Kropp filed the complaint last week, a hearing was held Sunday, and a decision issued Tuesday.

The court ordered to strike the committee's action from the minutes because it violated a restraining order the court issued last semester, and the action was therefore in violation of the SGA constitution.

The restraining order prevents Silkoff and Rabinowitz from "in any way assuming, acting as, or occupying the office of the SGA President," until the court decides otherwise.

But Robert Fadel, speaker of the senate, said early yesterday the court had no right to place the restraining order. "You can't put a restraining order on a legislative body," he said.

Last night, Fadel said he had problems with how the case was tried. There was complete silence in the room as Fadel listed what he felt were the judiciary's violations of the First and 14th Amendments of the US Constitution.

"I didn't hold a [senate] meeting last Wednesday because of Yom Kippur. I go to church on Sunday," he said. "That's all I have to say about a trial on a Sunday."

He also said two out of the three justices hearing the case were never approved as justices and some of the subpoenas for the case were not issued until after 5 p.m. the Friday before the hearing, which did not give enough time to prepare for the case.

"I want the senate to decide whether our agenda is going to be controlled," he said. "Tonight I think we are going to decide what we are working for."

Students rally against contra aid

By ED REYNOLDS
Collegian Correspondent

About 200 University of Massachusetts students rallied on the Student Union steps yesterday afternoon against contra aid.

The rally featured songs, poems and speeches denouncing American foreign policy in Nicaragua. As spectators chanted 'Books, not bombs," speaker after speaker called for an end to contra aid.

Pierre LaLiberte said: "Why is all this suffering and sheer madness being subsidized by your government," as supporters waved signs reading "[George] Bush is a contra too" and "Money for tuition not ammunition."

An opposing contingent chanted "boring, boring," but was soon quieted as Steve Duplesea, a chief organizer of the rally, took the podium.

Duplisea, chairman of the Young Communist League, likened Contra Aid to "throwing our money out the window." He urged the crowd to help "stop contra aid funding and start funding our education." The comment spured the crowd to chant "No to contra aid, yes to financial aid."

The crowd was enthusiastic for the rest of the rally, giving each speaker a solid round of applause. Highlights included songs by Juan David and a poem by Tom Hotz which called to "end the war once and for all."

Some of the people who attended the rally seized the opportunity to become involved in the cause. Prewritten postcards to state Rep. Silvio Conti (R-Amherst), from this congressional district, were available. The cards asked him to vote against contra aid.

About 200 students attend yesterday's anti-contra aid rally outside the Student Union.

Solidarity Association representatives asked for volunteers to travel to Washington and help "shut down the Pentagon" as part of a national demonstration against contra aid on Oct. 17, buses will be available.

Duplisea said he thought the rally went very well and and he said he sensed a tremendous amount of enthusiasm and optimism that contra aid will be ended.

Ted Maravelice, a member of the UMass Republican Club, said the rally "defined a position of the left inconsistent with American mainstream and the student population."

Minority enrollment is low

By GEORGE FRANCY
Collegian Staff

Minority enrollment at the University of Massachusetts has not kept pace with application and acceptance rates, according to figures supplied by the Admissions Office.

The office received about 1,400 more applications this year than in 1987, and accepted nearly 300 more students than a year ago.

However, only 395 minority students enrolled in 1988, up from 368 in 1987. This represents a percentage rise in enrollment of only 3.5 percent, while acceptance rose eight percentage points.

The table on page seven shows for the last four years that although more minority students are applying and being accepted, minority students are not accepting the University, despite active recruitment.

Students and campus administrators attribute this to a racially-tense climate on campus.

"Those students who were accepted had doubts," said Nelson Acosta, assistant director of Undergraduate Admissions. "We did well in terms of recruitment but we could have had a better year if the media coverage had not been what it was," he said.

Joshua Fontanez, who has worked with the admissions office on minority recruitment, agreed: "I think there are a lot of minority students who have been accepted that could have been scared away," Fontanez said.

Fontanez said he thought the efforts of Computer firms vie for business

Sales on concourse take a byte out of student's pockets

His maroon backpack thrown over his shoulder, a tear in his jeans above the left knee, his hand holding the receipt for his computer purchase, Bruce Ledoux remarked, "It's a lot of money."

A sophomore majoring in communications, Ledoux started looking around for the best computer deal after he got the syllabus for his communications class.

He is one of many who have hovered with bent head over glowing computer screens outside the University Store during computer fairs.

The interest to buy computers is so high at the University of Massachusetts that the University Store added a computer department last January.

Company representatives host computer fairs outside the store to promote their product, said Jay Whitney, the store's computer coordinator. Customers, he says, know him as the "computer guy."

A representative of IBM said his computer company hosts the fairs to stimulate sales and answer questions.

Said Ledoux: "They tried to sell me the most expensive computer."

However, University Store salespersons do not receive a commission for selling the computers, Whitney said.

Ledoux said, "They just answer questions. There's no pressure about it."

Standing among tables and stacked boxes juxtaposed to form a narrow path in the computer nook, Ledoux said, "I think I got a good deal."

The store sells computers and computer supplies only to UMass faculty, staff and students for personal use, Whitney said.

The store carries five computer companies' products and sells the computers at about a 40 percent savings compared to area stores, Whitney said. The University Store does not keep the computers in stock, and most of the prices range from $500 to $2,000.

Ledoux said he found he could buy a clone of the computer he purchased at about $100 to $200 cheaper in his hometown but the brand name, warranty, and ability to have it serviced on campus made him decide to buy it at the University Store.

Those who buy computers tend to be engineering majors, Whitney said. Some come in and immediately buy the com-

Attorney general heads probe

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — State Attorney General James Shannon yesterday took command of an investigation into a regional police academy where training resulted in the hospitalization of 16 recruits for exhaustion and dehydration.

The most seriously affected of the cadets, who, according to doctors, did not get enough water during vigorous exercise last week, remained in critical condition at a Pittsburgh hospital following a liver transplant. Several other cadets suffered kidney failure.

"The biggest issue is how these drill instructors and their assistants conducted themselves," said state Sen. Peter C. Webber, R-Pittsfield, one of several legislators calling for a legislative inquiry.

The Western Massachusetts Police Chiefs' Association called for the reassignment of the two state troopers in charge of training at the Agawam facility pending completion of the investigation. A spokeswoman for the state Department of Public Safety said both were still on the job yesterday.

On another front, Dr. Brian Blackbourne, the state's chief medical examiner, said he is re-opening his investigation into the July 1985 death of a police recruit who collapsed on the second day of training at the State Police Academy in Framingham.

Blackbourne said he plans to re-study an autopsy done on James Whitehouse formerly of Braintree to determine if the intensity of the training contributed to the recruit's death. State police found that the recruit had "suddenly collapsed while doing moderate exercise."

At Agawam, the trainee now in a Pittsburgh hospital collapsed on the first day of training on Sept. 19. After more than a dozen recruits were treated over the next several days, two internal investigations were announced.

But Shannon said at a Boston news conference that the state police and the Massachusetts Criminal Justice Training Council, which operate the Agawam academy, have agreed to call off their internal probe and cooperate with his investigation into the incident.

"There is only one investigation being conducted by the state and it is being conducted by the Department of the Attorney General," Shannon said.

New physician fees requested

BOSTON (AP) — A top-to-bottom plan for the reorganization of physician fees could raise the pay of general practitioners by 70 percent while cutting some surgeons' income in half, William C. Hsiao, the author of the plan said.

If adopted by private and government insurance programs, the long-awaited plan would sharply increase the pay for office visits while reducing fees for surgery and other procedures, such as installing pacemakers.

Hsiao, of the Harvard School of Public Health, contends the current system is "unworkable and unfair," and it short-changes doctors for day-to-day management of their patients while paying them far too much for exotic tests and other highly technical work.

He said his proposed fee structure will change doctors' financial incentives, and this will alter the way they practice medicine and ultimately improve patient care.

"You can predict that under the new system doctors will be willing to spend a lot more time with patients to examine and counsel them," Hsiao said. "Right now, physicians are being penalized financially for spending time with patients."

In addition, he said the changes could encourage more young doctors to go into primary patient care and lower the overall cost of medical treatment.

If accepted by Congress, the plan will be used to determine physicians' Medicare fees.

Time or aliens to kill? Visit the arcade

By DAVID R. MARK

For some, it's a place to try to pitch a no-hitter — for others, it's a place to fight intergallactic battles.

For most, though, the Campus Center Arcade is a place to take a break from studies.

With 29 video games and six pinball machines, the arcade, open daily from 7 a.m. to 1 a.m. and located on the concourse floor of the Campus Center, provides hours of entertainment or a five-to-10 minute study break for 25 cents.

"I haven't come here before, but it's a good break from studying," said Ellen Mori, a junior HRTA major who was playing the "Fire!" pinball machine with Winston Smith, also a junior HRTA major.

Over at the "Gold Medalist" video game, based on the Seoul Olympics, Patrick Cleary, a junior art history major, said the game is fun, but would be more fun if it was completely functional.

"This game takes a lot of beatings," said Cleary. "Whenever I get free-time. This is mindless entertainment, but it'd be better if somebody would fix it."

Two of the four player-controls on the game are not working, allowing only two players to play the game, instead of the four the game was designed for.

Peter Vogell, a freshman business administration major playing the game with Cleary, agreed the game should be fixed.

"This is the only game I like. They should fix this or get other games," he said.

The arcade does not provide entertainment solely for University students.

Ben Todd and Jason Chen, sophomores at Amherst High School, agreed the games in the Campus Center arcade were as good as arcades at the Hampshire and Mountain Farms Malls in Hadley. But the Campus Center arcade has one distinct advantage.

"It's too far to bike to Hampshire Mall," said Todd.

Parking crunch felt

By KIMBERLY ROBINSON
Collegian Correspondent

Parking in Amherst center and in some off-campus apartments has become a problem for some University of Massachusetts students.

Lisa Bornstein, a resident of Townhouse Apartments, is one of those students. She said her neighbors wake each other so cars can be moved to get out of their lots. "That's a real pain in the neck," she said.

Townhouse Property Manager Judy Johnson said, "As long as they're blocking their own roommates, there's no problem." She added town officials regulate how much land should be made available for parking. "We have expanded our lots already. Everything we have left is wetland, so we don't have anymore land we can expand on."

"We have a real problem with Brandywine (apartments) because they park in our lot," she said.

Erica Arbron, President of Robert & Snow Inc., which owns Brandywine, said, "Over the years, more people are bringing cars. I put in some new spaces last year, but there's not much more I can do about it."

"A lot of students bring their cars, and then they leave them. They [the cars] sit there until students leave at the end of the semester. The best I can tell you is that some people are not willing to walk to spaces."

Johnson said that Sunderland residents, who are unable to obtain parking stickers, park in Townhouse lots and take the bus to campus. Last year this became a problem and they were towed, she said.

"We are not out to tow our tenants," Johnson said. "We are trying as hard as we can."

Amherst Police Captain Dave Jankowski said, "There's a great concern about parking in town." However, he said: "The number of tickets we've been writing are normal for this time of year."

Paul Ganci, a student who was visiting friends recently near Mr. K's restaurant on North Pleasant Street said: "I actually got here a while ago, but it took me 20 minutes

Misconceptions of American Indians are widespread

By JOHN SWANSON
Collegian Staff

Rodina Cole still remembers one of the distractions at the American Indian powwow two weeks ago.

"People would go by and yell out what they think Indian noises are," she said. Cole, a spokesperson for the American Indian Student Association, said these misconceptions of Native American culture are widespread.

"White American society tries to cover up what (American Indians) have done," she said. Movies and history books that "teach white perspective" have reinforced the stereotypes, she said.

One of the biggest misconceptions of Indian culture that Cole sees is the belief that Indians no longer exist.

"We're an invisible people. I've heard people say there are no more Indians left and I think 'No, that's not true at all,'" she said.

Cole said the traditional Indian dance, music and dress all have significance in the culture.

"There is a meaning for every movement. There's an honor and a tribute to creation and the creator in all the dances. The songs are in a language, a native language. They give a message to all people to respect the creator and the earth, because it is our mother, and to remember what your ancestors have gone through," she said.

The University of Massachusetts American Indian Student Association has an active membership of about 10,

UHS: Pros and cons of the pill

By HOLLY ANGELO
Collegian Correspondent

The birth control pill is one of the most popular forms of birth control at University Health Services, according to a health educator.

"I would say the majority of women on a prescription method are on the pill because the only other prescription method is the I.U.D. and the diaphragm," said Ann Grose, health educator and nurse practitioner at UMass Health Services.

"I think it's up to each individual to assess the benefits and risks," said Colleen Donnelly, a staff person at Family Planning in Northampton. "There are an equal number of benefits and risks.

"The danger of the pill is that it does not protect you against sexually transmitted diseases (STD's)," said Grose. "The problem we see here is that women don't protect themselves against STD's while they are on the pill. The best idea is to use the pill and condoms together."

Grose warned of possible side effects when a woman goes on the pill such as minor nausea, breast tenderness, fluid retention, slight weight change, mood swings and vaginitis. "You might have cardiovascular problems or a stroke if you're on the pill and smoking," said Grose. "You're just putting yourself at more of a risk."

Donnelly said, "We recommend if people go onto the pill that they don't smoke at all or just a very few cigarettes per day."

But, she said, "it's very rare that we see anyone with one of these side effects."

These side effects are not as prominient as they used to be becuase the pill has changed over the years.

"In the old days there was a lot of estrogen in the pill but now it's so low a dose. It's really been very positive," Grose said.

The benefits of the pill are that it can regulate a woman's period, lessen cramping and bleeding during a period, and may reduce ovarian and endometrial cancers by 40 percent.

However, women who are over 40, smoke cigarettes or who have a family history of cardiovascular problems are at higher risk while they are on the pill, she said.

"You should wait three months (after stopping the pill) to become pregnant to make sure all of the hormone is out of your system," Grose said.

But, she said, "as far as we can tell it doesn't interfere with future fertility."

Madson's new special assistant rising to the top

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

The newest addition to the Vice Chancellor's staff has the potential and ambition to rise to the top, and she is taking the University of Massachusetts with her.

Charri Boykin-East, 33, a ten year veteran Resident Director in Van Meter East, has assumed the position of Assistant to Vice Chancellor Dennis Madson.

Boykin is a veteran Resident Director and holds nearly eleven years of organizational and developmental skills to her credit.

"I have a desire to understand people, to really hear what their concerns are," she said.

As Madson's assistant, "I respond to requests or inquiries by parents, students, and legislators. I help them to solve problems with things like courses, academics or financial aid," Boykin said.

"Sometimes parents jump the gun [when there is a problem.] Instead of going to the R.D. or R.A., they call the chancellor," she laughed. "I try to refer them to the right agency."

Boykin said she also writes routine correspondents and will hopefully represent Madson at special meetings.

"I feel I'm in a place where I can make some impact. This is my chance to put some of my ideas forward," she said.

Boykin's Van Meter staff said her new position will be beneficial to residential education campus wide. "I'm very excited for her being there because this is a very rare opportunity for input from residential education directly into the student affairs office," said Khandi Bourne, former A.R.D. and present R.D. of Van Meter East.

"She is a role model to me because of her ability in managing a staff and giving support, particularly around social issues," Bourne said. "It's phenomenal the way that she creates a community in this cluster."

Sexism and racism are important issues to Boykin, who was one of few people who went to the New Africa house during the takeover last semester and offered her support, said Bourne.

Boykin said, "For me, it's important that I make an impact, especially on racism and sexism. Some people shut people out because they don't like the way they look. The person shut out may be the person who could change the world."

"We each have to beat that and pound the pavement to make change. If there is an injustice, folks need to speak about it. I have an obligation to teach my daughters, so when they see sexism and racism, they'll be able to name it," she said.

The Assistant to the Vice Chancellor position is temporary and will end in December but she said she hopes to continue working in a leadership position. "It's been a fantastic opportunity. I want a 9 to 5 job because I feel I have much to offer and I want to show the skills I've learned.

"I really needed the break [as an R.D.] but I wasn't willing to take a break at the expense of myself or my family. I do miss my staff and I enjoy feeling like I've made a difference. People come up to me and say 'you've changed my life,'" she said

In the spring, Boykin will not return to Van Meter East as an R.D. but said she will continue teaching courses in oppression and other social issues at the university.

Carla Boremi, a resident assistant in Van Meter East, said working with Boykin was an experience she treasured.

"Charri made you feel comfortable when you had a problem or if you had something you didn't agree with her about. She's a very personable person, always willing to help out," Boremi said.

Boykin said she is continuing her education at UMass and is working toward a doctorate in organizational development. "I want to finish my dissertation so that I can be in a position to choose. It will be a culmination of many years of hard work, pain, sacrifice, and joy," she said.

"It will be a closure to a piece of my life — it's spiritual because of my family. I lost both of my parents when I was very young and my brother died six years ago," she said.

"I feel like I have to get a degree for each one of them, and then go on," Boykin said.

Richard East, her husband, and her two daughters Renee, 8 and Ravan, 4, are supportive of her efforts. "I guess I'm luckier than most. I have a marriage intact and two beautiful young women to raise. Being a mother is a priority to me."

"I feel proud that they feel they can be doctors — that they can be anything in the world. I think I can be anything I want, too," Boykin said.

Boykin was born in Kinston, North Carolina and said she lived as an "army brat" because her father was an Air Force career man. Her parents both died when she was very young and her brother died six years ago, but she said their early encouragement of education is critical to where she is today.

"My father felt Massachusetts had a great educational system and I felt I had to take advantage of such a system. For me, there was no place else to go," she said.

After graduating from UMass with a Bachelor's degree in journalism, Boykin attended Cambridge College in Northampton and received a Master's degree in education. In 1977, she returned to UMass as a Resident Director and a doctoral student.

Boykin and her husband own and run Especially for You, a store located on Rt. 9 in Hadley which specializes in beauty products for people of color.

the University were positive, because instead of trying to hide problems with racism, the University has dealt with the problems, although the publicity surrounding the school has not always been positive.

Associate Dean of Students Rick Townes said media coverage this campus has received might be a factor in turning away students, but most people take the media with a "grain of salt," and have a cynical view of the media. He added that he thought the media had been "reasonably fair and accurate."

"We all have to recognize that we have some problems," Townes said. "We have to continue to have an open dialogue."

"It's a troubling point for me," Townes said of the enrollment figures.

"This campus genuinely wants to attract minority students," Townes said. "It's uncomfortable for all of us; we've got to find a way to overcome the problem."

He said parents and minority applicants themselves had asked about the climate of the campus, whether it was safe. UMass minority students are asked the same questions by prospective students. The students to whom this question was posed face a difficult dilemma, because "they don't want to discourage them, but they also don't want to be less than candid," Townes said.

Mark Codling-Davy is a member of the monitoring committee set up after the New Africa House takeover in February. He says some students still cannot walk around campus without feeling a little threatened.

"I would say there is an uncomfortable climate," Codling-Davy said. "The ripples are being felt all over campus from the events of the past."

Townes said he had heard of minor racial events recently on campus.

"I'm surprised, frankly, that there are things still going on. The problem isn't going to go away any time soon. We need to continue to prod away at the problem. I think we'll be okay."

to park my car."

Sidewalk vendors David Gordon and Sue, of Sue the Wandering Ewe, have a good view of town-traffic and they agreed bicycle use needs to be encouraged.

Sue said, "I think bicycle lanes and bicycle parking would be a good idea." A few years ago when the town put in curbs, it was rumored they were to do that, she said. "Something needs to be done to make bicycle traffic better," she said.

Some downtown employees said they have been pushed out of their designated lots by other cars and are forced to run out and feed the meters every hour.

"Some employees park and use up the meters all day," said Bart Mitchell of the Amherst Planning Department. Some students park in town and take the bus to campus while others, who stay in town, will not settle for parking a few blocks away and then walking, he said.

"We have just hired a consultant to look into the possibility of constructing a parking garage downtown," Mitchell said. He called the project major undertaking.

Town vendors said they feel a parking garage might be disruptive in town, and they think there could be some opposition.

The debate: more than a mud fight

Well, last Sunday the country got to see the presidential candidates debate for the first time. Next time the people will see them debate for the last time. Nice to know that they want us to understand their positions and want to give us a chance to see them together. (Actually George is more at fault because he refused to do anymore than two.)

Peter Leon

Anyway, in order to see the debate I brought my little two inch screen TV to work, and as I waited on customers I watched. The campaign strategists for each candidate put a great deal of work into making these two look good. They both practiced their responses and had previously thought-up quick comebacks to the nasty things each would say to the other. Of course everyone, including the panel of questioners wore the trendy red tie, so everyone in America would know that they were at least up to date on fashion.

Overall I would say Mike won. But I don't mean George lost either. He gave his usual showing, which is a bit reserved, a little nervous and uncomfortable, and full of Ivy league witticisms about Boston. But, he failed to look like he had specific plans (especially on penalties for women who get abortions), and he failed to make Mike be the nasty left-winger he thinks Mike is.

Mike on the other hand gave a performance which I did not expect. He blew George's main two negative assertions against him out of the water.

First George has been painting him as a "Massachusetts liberal." Mike is a liberal and he is from Massachusetts, but he didn't look like the stereotypical "Massachusetts liberal" George wants him to. Instead he came off as a very moderate, strong willed, competent candidate.

George's second assertion that Mike isn't patriotic fell to the wayside. Mike responded to these ideas with the story of his father. His father came to this country and made it big. Now Mike wants to repay his country, by serving it. He sounded like he felt obliged to do this service.

ABC's Peter Jennings, according to two critics Newsweek interviewed about the debate, looked the most presidential, but John Mashek of the Atlanta Journal-Constitution gets my vote for best questions. He asked the candidates about their choices for veep. He ended the string of questions by asking Mike "Who's right," in references to Dukakis' and Lloyd Bentsen's major differences.

Mike responded well again by saying he believed Lloyd was well qualified, no one ever having questioned his running mate's qualifications (unlike George's). He also said he hoped if someone came up with a crazy idea to sell arms to terrorists that Lloyd would tell him it was crazy and not endorse it (unlike George). He answered the question about whose right with a quote which went something like "If two people agree on everything only one of them is doing the thinking."

I'M LOOKING INTO THE CAMERA, I'M SMILING, I'M BEING FORCEFUL ... I'M NOT NERVOUS ... I'M NOT A WIMP, I'M NOT A WIMP, I'M NOT A WIMP, I'M NOT A WIMP...
ARIEL BRAIN UMASS '88

Finally Mike showed he can be tough and compassionate. When asked to decide if the lives of Americans hostages were worth negotiating with terrorists, Mike gave a simple compassionate statement about how he sympathized with the families of hostages, but negotiating with terrorists would leave the country open to more terrorism. Mike also made reference to the US policy on terrorism, which was written by George Bush just before Iran-Contra began. George, in reply, could only muster "I wrote . . . the best anti-terrorist report written."

Now don't get me wrong, I'm not an ardent Duke supporter, he has innumerable problems. He does, however, have one thing over George Bush I like — he's not George Bush.

All us fools voting for all them fools

I remember reading somewhere that ancient societies would choose a scapegoat. The man would be provided for by the state; he'd have a place to live, food, and clothing. Sounds like a good deal, huh? I wouldn't mind it. Oh yeah, there was one minor, inconsequential detail. At the end of his term, the scapegoat would be killed by the people.

It's not so different here.

Okay, so no one gets killed. Still, we do have a national scapegoat and a national hero.

Pamela McCarthy

It's election time. Time to elect a new scapegoat. It used to be that all of the elected scapegoats started out as heroes. This election may just start the newly elected President off as our scapegoat. (But then, scapegoats are people who are only a target for blame. These buffoons deserve the ridicule they get.)

People love to hate leaders — especially presidents. I'm not excusing the guys who deserve it (remember Watergate? Contra-gate?). Any leader who violates our trust has earned the contempt of the people. But some of the American people are equally pathetic.

Look at us, we want perfection. We claim to be so angry because this election doesn't cover the issues. Since when have issues been important to the majority of Americans? We want a distinguished-looking man in a three-piece suit spewing forth noble sounding but empty speeches. We want a saint, whose past is perfect (yet we conveniently forget our own wrongdoings). We want a guy who shakes hands, kisses babies, espouses traditional values and social change, who is pro-military yet wants world peace. We don't want to hear about the issues; we'd feel too uncomfortable. We want to be told things we like to hear. We want a con artist, not a leader.

When Ronald Reagan was first running for President, we couldn't contain our excitement. "Oh, Ronnie will put the country in shape. He'll cut those nasty taxes and give everyone jobs. He won't let those commie Ruskies get the better of us." No one considered what the consequences may be; we heard some appealing spew, so we cast our ballots for Ron. After some time with Reaganomics, these same people have decided that Reagan is a senile, old warmonger. Yet he was elected twice. Is this because we took spew over substance again? I think so.

Both of them told us what we wanted to hear. We elected both. Then, when we experienced the consequences, we turned them into national targets for our barbs.

Before Reagan, there was Jimmy Carter. We loved to hate ol' Jimmy, didn't we? Oh, we thought he was an indecisive wimp who wrecked our economy. After eight years of Reagan, he's considered a great man.

So here we are with Bush and Dukakis running.

Oh joy.

They are doing what we want them to do best — put on a show. Mudslinging, empty sermons, and grand theatrical displays of patriotism have been featured this election year. That's what we've wanted all along. A show. Let's enjoy it while we can, folks. When one of the jokers gets elected, we'll hate him. We'll start sniveling about how the issues were avoided when they were running. "There was no substance in the campaign," we'll moan.

That's right. There is no substance in this campaign. That's what we wanted. Our next president will probably disappoint us, a man we can love to hate.

I have only one thing to say if the next guy is a flaming incompetent.

We deserve it.

What's the matter with me?

Little pieces of cardboard that I'll always love

Life was so simple when I was a kid. Elementary school was not the toughest thing in the world, summers were nothing more than non-stop recreation, and my favorite hobby was just that — a hobby.

But today, I've found that collecting baseball cards is more than just a hobby. It's become big business.

Jim Clark

I remember the first time I ever bought a package of baseball cards. It was 1975, the year the Red Sox went on to fall in the World Series in seven games to the Cincinnati Reds. The first card I saw on the top of that Topps package was Tim McCarver. Today, McCarver is the color man for the New York Mets. Then, he was a backup catcher with the Red Sox. I was ecstatic.

I still have that McCarver card, safely tucked away in the top drawer of my dresser at home. It's not in good condition, but it serves as a reminder for me — a memory of sorts.

I don't have many other cards from that year, mainly because the budget of a seven-year-old doesn't allow for much excessive spending. With it costing 15 cents for a package of 12 cards and a generously-sized piece of Bazooka chewing gum, I had to take it easy.

As the years went along, my investment in the hobby became more and more rampant. I began to seek out the complete set, all of the cards produced in a single season. This required considerable patience, but it made collecting all the more enjoyable. Trading with friends was a valuable source of obtaining the cards missing from your collection. You would be willing to trade Carl Yastrzemski for Ted Kubiak, if that's what it took.

Then in 1981, baseball card collecting took a giant turn. Whether it's for the better I haven't yet concluded. The Topps Chewing Gum Co., for many years, had been the one and only major card manufacturer. Anytime you mentioned baseball cards, it was assumed you were talking about Topps.

However, two other companies, Fleer and Donruss, burst onto the scene that year. What had been more or less a monopoly on Topps' part quickly became major competition. Collectors were now forced to pick and choose the cards that they were to go after. Prices began to go skyward. Kids, for the most part, were being shut out of the one hobby that was primarily centered around the enjoyment of kids — the depiction of a child's game. Adults were using the hobby as a tool for big business.

I knew I was in trouble when a couple of years later I went to a dealer, looking for a few of the cards from my earlier years that I was missing. The prices were beginning to reach astronomical proportions. Single cards were going for $5 and sometimes $10 apiece. Kids looking for cards of their heroes, a Wade Boggs, Don Mattingly or Dwight Gooden, were now having to shell out mucho dinero to get it.

I began to sour on the hobby. Needless to say, once I found more important needs for my still-meager income, I dropped out.

Fortunately, the cards I had gathered were still around. Seeing the prices increase faster than the stock market, I wasn't foolish enough to sell early. Also, my understanding mother never went bonkers and threw everything out when I went off to school.

My collection is still intact.

Thank God. As I sit back now, I begin to realize the one thing that I had overlooked. Despite all of the financial burden that now encumbers the efforts of every hobbyist, there still is one characteristic about baseball cards that cost could never tarnish.

They still allow you to cross that fine line between fan and participant. Baseball cards are the connection between the fan and the player. The full-color photos on front, the statistics and information on the back, are a simplified hands-on guide to the career of the player. Browsing through my collection one day last winter, those childhood memories returned. I came across that old Tim McCarver card, with the wrinkles, gum stains and curled-up corners. That little piece of cardboard served as a piece of nostalgia to a game that I grew up to love, and still do to this day.

That kid in me has returned.

No democracy in El Salvador

There is a crisis in El Salvador. Now, more than any time in the last eight years, the power of a small ruling class is being challenged by the people.

There are two areas of conflict. There is an armed conflict between the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front (FMLN) and the Salvadoran Armed Forces. It is there that the unarmed protest in the streets fronts the National Guard, the National Police, and the Treasury Police. In both of these struggles a grass roots movement of people seeks economic justice, human rights, and an opportunity to participate in the governing of El Salvador.

The current government seeks only to maintain the power of the Salvadorian Oligarch. In order to hold down the Salvadoran people the government needs $1.5 million a day. In 1987 the US gave more to the Salvadoran government than the Salvadoran taxpayers did.

Despite the massive US intervention, the Salvadoran government is losing control of the country. The war between the FMLN and the government is close to stalemated. A recent report by four Lieutenant Colonels at the John F. Kennedy School of Governement in Boston concluded that the FMLN could keep up the current level of conflict indefinitely.

They also said that the Salvadoran goyernment could not continue to govern without meeting the needs of the people. But the Salvadoran government can not meet the demands of the people while it spends all of its money to prosecute the war.

Within the Salvadoran government there is a conflict about how to stop the massive popular protests. The US and its surrogate in El Salvador, the Christian Democratic party, advocate more repression with minor reforms. The ARENA party supports a policy of total war. This means massive killings of civilians and a return to the policies of the early 1980s when the death-squads reigned supreme. This argument has split the Salvadoran government, rendering it almost entirely ineffective.

Neither more repression with window-dressing reforms nor total war will stop the popular movement for change in El Salvador. The labor unions are demanding a fair working wage. The students are demanding funding for the University of El Salvador. The peasants are demanding land. The human rights groups are demanding an end to the governmental killings and kidnappings.

If government does nothing, the people will continue protesting and taking to the streets. If the attacks by the state continues to escalate, there could be an immediate overthrow. The most recent solution to a near-stalemated conflict is a new government or broader based government. Since the US supplies the money for the war in El Salvador the US can create a new policy that will end the war.

Battering and abuse doesn't just happen, nor are women just victims.

Unfortunately, some choose abusive mates over and over again. They can't leave because the fear of loneliness outweighs the fear of a beating.

Others don't know how to have a relationship that is not abusive.

As children our parents teach most of us to respect ourselves and each other. School supposedly reinforces positive self images. We are "The Little Engine that Could" or a Pippie Longstocking who can do anything.

Imagine being told you couldn't all the time.

Imagine that desperate feeling pervading every thought you have. You aren't a red engine anymore, but a flat car used only for storage and carrying lumber. You are useful only as long as someone else uses you and you have never done it for you wanted to do. Pretty soon you don't know the way you are, feel and think.

she brings her father a beer and talks "clothes" with her mother for an hour. Perhaps she'll act out, sleeping around or breaking dishes, so they'll focus on her instead of each other. Perhaps she'll just listen and learn how a man and a woman "love" by screaming and fighting.

The girl-child then goes to high school and falls head over heels with a boy just like her father. Someone who doesn't believe she can do anything right, or who also believes grown-ups yell and hit instead of talk and care. She can't leave because she is responsible for him. He's the only man who could ever love her. Maybe she'll marry him or maybe she'll find another just like him.

It's a cycle of abuse.

It doesn't have to be.

I knew a couple where the man always told the woman what to do and how to do it. He would always tell her stupid and say she wasn't trying. All my friends would talk about these two. No one would say anything to her or to him. When they broke up, everyone agreed it was a good thing for her. But no one had the courage to say so.

We need more people willing to speak to their friends. Break the [illegible] of silence that surrounds abuse and pain. I wasn't brave enough to help last time, the next time I will.

They said it. . .

Republican campaign strategists want CBS anchorman Dan Rather asking questions at the next presidential debate. Rather would likely be on best behavior after his confrontation with Bush over the Iran-contra affair last January; but another clash could generate public sympathy for the veep. "If Rather is nasty to Bush, that would be the blessing we'd all pray for," says a top Bush aide. The Bush camp last week rejected a Dukakis proposal that debate panels be composed solely of network anchors. Publicly, they said it would be unfair to print journalists. Their real objection, campaign insiders say, was that the TV celebrities would boost viewership.

Sub-station threatens privacy

All residents of University housing should be concerned about the placement of a University police sub-station in the lobby and/or fifth floor of Washington Tower in October.

Though the police's intended desire to "improve our relations with the community," and educate "the community about prevention and safety in their living area," is completely understandable, why is a police station in a residential hall also necessary?

Public Safety classes could be advertised and held in student lounges on a periodic basis in all dorms; this would allow the police to reach more students. A police substation located in Hampden Student Center would similarly expose more students to a friendly police presence on campus and provide a more central location within the Southwest Area.

University residence hall rules state that "the University will not intrude into a student's personal effects or otherwise search a room except with permission of the student, or by appropriate legal authorities with a search warrant. The University is guided by the 'Plain View Doctrine' and may report evidence of unlawful acts in 'Plain View.'"

The establishment of a police station within a residence hall is in direct contradiction with this policy. Police Officers in a lobby or upstairs in any building are guided not by the policy of 'Plain View,' but by their own broader powers of probable cause. A cup full of beer will hardly raise the eyebrows of an R.A., but a police officer, as a result of his or her training, can determine that, A, there is beer in the cup and B, you may be underage. These observations give the officer 'probable cause' to ask you for I.D. and possibly arrest you.

Perhaps the police think that for Southwest to become a true urban community, students must soon join the rest of all city dwellers in closing and locking their doors while relaxing in their rooms. But the students will not be shutting their doors out of fear. They will be closing them to protect their own right to privacy.

There is no doubt that the many media and informational sources emanating from the university have a liberal slant, but when this bias appears in a publication which is credited as being unprejudiced, something must be said.

It's obvious this year's Course and Teacher Evaluation guide has not been established to "create a comprehensive, responsible publication" as they introduce [illegible]. How can a publication [illegible] claim [illegible] when it features Students for America as promoting [illegible] and [illegible] while promoting the Radical Student Union as 'taking an active role in shaping the future by working for social change through research and education' or when it describes the Valley Women's Voice as 'seeking to represent all women's voices.' Interesting, but Elizabeth Dole and Jeane Kirkpatrick don't seem to get much print in the VWV.

It's [illegible] kind of bias that shines a dim light on the rest of this publication.

Godfathers give it back to press

By GRAEME THOMSON
Collegian Correspondent

The Godfathers are the kind of band who probably began from a small ad in the "Musicians Wanted" section of a local paper. You know the kind of thing —"have songs, image and attitude, will travel." One might accurately describe them as dedicated, accomplished, aggressive and polished. The rock publication New Music Express described them as "arrogant," but it really doesn't fit them. "Proud" would describe them better. Yes, the Godfathers are a proud band . . . and proud of it too.

In an interview with Peter Coyne of the Godfathers, he reacted to the British press' treatment of the band by saying, "That's just bullshit. We told the N.M.E. that we were from up and down the country (two of the band's members, George Mazur and Mike Gibson, are from Yorkshire), but they just labeled us as a South London band. They even spelled it 'Saaath Laaandon.' The music press just seek to put you down, and you expect it from them."

Coyne's attitude isn't surprising, considering the fact that the N.M.E. has little to do with promoting such bands as the Godfathers. In fact, the Godfathers are exactly the kind of band that they love to trash. Pseudos can't cling to their mystique because it isn't something they have in abundant supply. Instead, the Godfathers are great believers in tradition.

"We just want to write great songs for our next album, which is going to be really different from Birth, School, Work, Death. We've already got eight songs which are all really different, all different styles," Coyne said.

Coyne is despondent, perhaps predictably so, about the state of the music industry today. "It's absolutely shocking, there's so much crap around," he said. However, he does find time for bands like the Smithereens and the Pogues because of their "energy and originality. The Pogues are definitely doing something different."

It's funny that Coyne should mention the Smithereens because they sound like the Godfathers' twin band, at least in intent. Both bands are rooted in a sixties sensibility established by such classic bands as the Rolling Stones, the Small Faces and the Kinks.

Living Colour breaks the mold of black music

By SAAD HOPKINS
Collegian Staff

Living Colour, playing tonight at the Student Union Ballroom with the Godfathers, prove that you don't have to be young and pop out of a rap-in-the-box screaming "Yo! Bum rush the show!" in a White Castle parking lot in the South Bronx in order to be recognized as a black musician. The New York City-based Living Colour is truly a unique ensemble. Vernon Reed's powerful guitar dispels the notion that black musicians cannot be taken seriously as a rock 'n roll band.

During a break at a gig in Rochester, New York, Living Colour's bassist Muzz Skillings told the Collegian a little more about the band that is making musical headway across the country.

Collegian: Here's a standard question. How was the current Living Colour line up established?

Muzz Skillings: Vernon (Reed) first met Corey Clover at a birthday party two years ago. He listened to him sing and was pleased with what he heard, so he put him on hold for a while until he could get things started. Then the original drummer left and Will Calhoun was called in to do some gigs. I was called in a little later from the Black Rock Coalition. We got our act together and that was that.

Collegian: Epic Records is the label distributing you in the US. It's a major label. Were you aiming so high? Did you expect to get picked up by a major label?

Skillings: Epic turned out to be ideal because they were "hands off." Other labels we tried to work with had this image in mind of what we could be. Their attitudes were like, "We can do this with them" and we didn't want that shit. We wanted to sign with a record company that didn't want to change us, and Epic was just that. They wanted our music just as it is.

Collegian: Were there any independent companies interested at first?

Skillings: Yeah, before we signed. Epic wasn't the only label. One of our concerns was who would suit our interests, then who would sign us.

Collegian:When you play venues wehre people don't know who you are, aprat formthe fact that they hear you are a black band, are the pre-conceived notions as to who or what kind of music you play? Are you met with blank stares?

Skillings: Yeah. There are presumptions. People will ask us "Are you rap? Reggae? Disco? Funk?" They'd never stop to think we'd be a rock'n'roll band. Black or whites. So at first we were certainly met with blank stares. Now that we're a little more popular, and people know who we are and because of our involvemnt with the Black Rock Coalition, it's almost an immediate association that we play rock'n'roll.

Collegian: And what are the reactions to that?

Skillings:Either they totally get into it, which is mostly the case, or they'e got problems. People who don't like us, don't like music.

I can't see anyone not getting into this band. Living Colour are a great idea. Sure there have been other black musicians who ahve busted the chain of "yo-boy hip hop," but apart from Bad Brains only Vernon Reed is today one of the only real hard rock black musicians. Reed strangles his guitar in the traditions of some of the real guitar greats, Jimi Hendricks, J. Mascus, Lou Reed and it is Vernon Reed who is responsible for bringing individual talents of Clover, Skillings and Calhoun together.

Collegian: With Living Colour sounding the way they do, one would think that MTV is an unavoidable part of their future.

Skillings: Not necessarily the case. People tell me they've seen the video at, say, 8:30 a.m. or during some other awkward time slot.

Collegian:do you think this MTV tour will effect your airplay?

Skillings:This time we're touring colelges anduniversityies so the college market may pick up a little. I guess this tour is helpful. But it'll take more than just touring the college circuit to get the commerical radio stations interested in us.

Coyne doesn't have much patience with "poser" bands such as fellow post punkers That Petrol Emotion, saying, "It's just avant garde crap, sounding like other people's music. We just want to sound like the Godfathers. That doesn't mean that all our records sound the same — it's just an identifyable sound. I mean early Stones isn't like the records they made when they were fucked up, but you still know it's the Stones."

You can see where Coyne is coming from, but I don't know if I agree. After all, at the end of the day, it's the noise that comes out of the radio. And to my mind the Godfathers make a noise I've heard too many times before.

You may disagree. Judge for yourself tomorrow at the Student Union Ballroom when they play with Living Colour. Living Colour? Now that's a noise I can deal with.

L'Oasis brings Brown, I-Culture

LIVEWIRE

By SAAD HOPKINS
Collegian Staff

Tonight is the big night — the first UPC production of the year. Living Colour and The Godfathers play the Student Union Ballroom tonight at 8:30 p.m. Get there early so you don't miss a thing. Colour starts, Godfathers end the show. Tickets are $6 for students, $8 for public. Don't miss it.

But, if you're looking for other live entertainment — fear not! Sheehan's and L'Oasis are the places to be. Reggae band The Mystic Jammers are at L'Oasis tonight and should be checked out. I heard a tape of theirs the other day, and as much as I hate to admit it, I was very impressed. Vintage reggae without all of that sampler/dub clutter.

And L'Oasis doesn't stop there. Area veterans who've relocated to Boston, I-Culture will play both Friday and Saturday nights. The cover shouldn't be outrageous, but it is advisable to purchase tickets ahead of time, especially on Saturday night at 6:00, which is the all-ages show, or at 9:00, which is the regular over-21 show. The band is making it big in Boston, bigger than expected, and this just may be the last time you'll get a chance to see them as an underground band. Go!

Old beatniks and lovers of jazz greats should consider going to L'Oasis Monday night and bring $10 to see the great Marion Brown, with special guest Mal Waldron. Brown is very much respected within the community and has a huge following. Unfortunately, it's an over 21 only show.

Duke Robillard is playing at Sheehan's tonight; tickets are $5 in advance. Tomorrow night you can see The Zulus with very special guests The Lonely Moans. Those who want to see the Moans are in for a shock. They've given up on covering surf tunes, and have started to probe into noise. Sounds great,and for $4.99 it sounds even better. On Saturday you can see other area legends, Pajama Slave Dancers with special guests, The Blood Oranges.

George Winston, Windham Hill recording artist, plays John M. Greene Hall at Smith College, Saturday night. Tickets are $15 in advance. This show is sponsored by the Iron Horse Cafe. Other events at the Iron Horse this weekend include songwriter Patty Larkin; $7 at the door. Blues guitarist John Hammond plays two shows tomorrow night, at 7 and 10 p.m. Tickets are $8 in advance. And on Monday night, New Wave Cafe presents Uncle Bonsai - affectionally known as the "Cheerleaders on Drugs."

according to member Donna Goodleaf. The group has no organizational positions other than the group's two spokespersons, Cole and Rene Lopes. The association's cultural center is located in the basement of Knowlton House in the Northeast Residential Area.

The annual powwow in September and American Indian Awareness Month in March are the association's two main activities during the year, Cole said.

In addition to the stereotypes that plague Indians on campus, the University provides little administrative or financial support, Goodleaf said. This year's powwow was particularly troublesome.

"We didn't have any funding. That was very surprising. Usually they (the University) foot the Physical Plant bill, but not this year," she said. Cole said the organization needs a full-time faculty or staff employee. She also suggested the addition of a Native American Studies program.

The goal of the organization, Cole said, is "to educate the campus, to let them know that we're still here, to let them know that we are the indigenous people of this land."

Parasitic insect threatening crops

BOSTON (AP) — A parasitic mite that can devastate bee colonies during the winter has infested hives in Massachusetts, posing a threat to next year's fruit crop, state agricultural officials said yesterday.

The Varroa Jacobsini mite was brought into the state by migratory beekeepers from Florida in the spring and detected this month in hives in southern Massachusetts, officials said.

The 15,000 to 20,000 beehives imported for apple, cranberry and blueberry pollination have been ordered out of the state, but the damage already has been done.

"I see no reason why we're not going to have a steady spread of this," said Lewis Wells, director of the state Agriculture Department's Division of Regulatory Services. "One could expect at least initially a drop in the number of hives."

The Varroa mite, the size of a pinhead, can quickly destroy bee colonies and has been detected in 18 states. The federal government in May lifted a quarantine on interstate bee transportation after it proved too costly and unmanageable.

Wells accused the state's two migratory beekeepers of knowingly bringing the mite into the state from Florida, despite the state regulations requiring certificates proclaiming bees mite-free before they can enter Massachusetts.

"We did contact these people in Florida and told them we wanted notification and inspection slips for each one of the hives," he said. "We found out not only that they came in, but did not have all the documents."

But he added: "We do not have a cordon around the state. We don't stop all truckloads of bees at the state border."

The state has about 4,000 hives and relies on migrated bees to pollinate crops. While this year's harvest appears strong, growers are concerned that too few bees could reduce next year's crops by as much as 50 percent.

"Now that they've been found, there's a possibility that over the winter, the hives will die out and we won't have anything for next year," said Irving Demoranville, director of the University of Massachusetts' Cranberry Experiment Station.

Increased penalties on violations proposed

BOSTON (AP) — Lt. Gov. Evelyn Murphy yesterday proposed increasing penalties for violations of the state's ethics laws, limiting lobbying activities of former government officials and banning speaking fees for lawmakers and other public servants.

"We, in Massachusetts, can be proud of our ethics law and our Ethics Commission," Murphy told a gathering marking the commission's 10th anniversary. "But we should use this 10th anniversary symposium to look to the future and consider if there are areas where improvements can be made."

Among those areas which need toughening, Murphy said, is money and gifts (honoraria) public officials receive for speaking to organizations which frequently have special-interest concerns over which the officials have some control.

Murphy said the commission's advisory statement placing restrictions on honoraria still leaves "many grey areas" and that the issue would better be dealt with through a change in law.

Asked later if she thought legislators would approve such a law, Murphy said, "I think it requires some reflections and conversations with the Legislature. (But) I don't think there would be necessarily major opposition to it."

For that reason, she said, any legislation to ban the practice, whether introduced by the commission or the governor's office, may require setting some limits so that lower-paying government positions may be exempt.

puter on the "gold card", while others think for a while before buying, he said.

"I tend to be a pretty impulsive buyer. This time I sat down and read a lot," Ledoux said.

The computer department is loaded with price indexes and literature explaining the features of the models. Students tend to research the market because of the price of the computers, Whitney said.

"I guess you could say college students are noted for being poor," said Kurt Edwards, a sophomore electrical engineering major, who was testing one of the computers at the computer fair. "I would be interested if I had the money."

Steve Adler, a salesperson in the computer department, said "parents are easy with money if it has an educational purpose."

The computer store cannot sell video games for the computers because the games are not educational, said Jennifer Sherry, another salesperson.

Ledoux said he is not going to buy games for his computer. "I'll just sit there and play games instead of doing my work."

But those who stop to investigate the computers where the blue and white balloons loom over the tables are not always intent upon buying a computer.

Ezra Chan, a junior in mechanical engineering, said he stoped to play Jeopardy, a video game similar to Trivial Pursuit. "It's cheaper than a video game."

Man convicted of bank robbery dies

BOSTON (AP) — Adolph "Jazz" Maffie, the last survivor of those convicted in the 1950 Brink's robbery which was the largest in US history at the time, has died at 77.

Maffie, convicted in the $2.7 million robbery, died Sunday at Brigham and Women's Hospital after a long illness.

There were 11 participants in the Jan. 17, 1950 robbery, in which seven men wearing pea coats and Halloween masks took $1.2 million in cash and $1.5 million in checks and securities from Brink's counting room in Boston's North End.

One robber acted as a lookout atop a building barely a block from Old North Church, where Paul Revere had used a lantern to warn colonists of the British approach, and used a flashlight to signal to his cohorts that all was clear for the heist.

The robbers opened three locked doors and surprised five Brink's employees working beside the vault.

It took the FBI six years to solve the case, and eventually nine men went to prison. But only $57,000 was ever recovered.

Where did all the money go? "Gambling and supporting a family for six years prior to our arrest," Francis "Sandy" Richardson said during a 1977 publicity stunt at the scene of the crime to promote "The Brink's Job," a book and film about the heist.

Authorities said the robbery was planned in the living room of Maffie, a Boston native who later lived in Quincy.

Maffie was convicted of armed robbery in the case in 1956 after being named by Joseph "Specs" O'Keefe, who turned state's witness because he believed the other had cheated him of his share.

Maffie was sentenced to life in prison, but his sentence was commuted by then-Gov. John Volpe on Dec. 22, 1969, he was released after serving nearly 14 years of his sentence.

The other men convicted in the robbery got out of prison between 1967 and 1971. Five of the robbers worked with the authors of "The Brink's Job" for a share of the profits.

After being released, Maffie joined his family in Quincy and worked as a car salesmen.

Maffie was one of eight children. He went to school for six years, and at various times worked as a salesman, meat clerk and manager of a pool room. He served in the US Army during World War II.

He had scrapes with the law as a youth and was convicted of tax evasion in 1952.

He is survived by a son, a daughter, three brothers, a sister, four grandchildren and two great-grandchildren.

One of the other robbers, Vincent J. Costa, was arrested again in February 1985, when he was 70, while leaving a donut shop in Chelmsford after police said he had three ounces of cocaine hidden under a shirt.

Costa was arrested by a detective who played an FBI agent in the film about the robbery.

Despite the cash, some of the robbers said they wished they never became involved in the caper.

"I was a sucker," Costa said in 1977. "I guess we all were."

"I've got plenty of regrets," Richardson said at the time. "Crime doesn't pay. I would have much more money saved now if I had worked."

Report lambasts rail line company

WASHINGTON (AP)— A strike-plagued New England freight rail line hired "plainly unqualified" replacement engineers while strikers engaged in a "campaign of intimidation" and sabotage, the Federal Railroad Association said yesterday.

A 44-page report was harshly critical of both management and labor at Guilford Transportation Industries, where workers went on strike Nov. 12, 1987, following an accident at a Lawrence, Ma. freight yard that killed a conductor. Strikers returned to work this summer after a federal arbitration board ruled in their favor.

"Both management and those opposing management's position have demonstrated their willingness to compromise both workplace and public safety when their economic interests are at stake," the FRA report said.

Labor and management were willing "to use the safety issue as leverage to achieve (their) objectives."

The agency disagreed with the union's contentions that safety problems existed before the strike. But the report said engineers hired to replace striking workers were recruited "from any available source . . . in disregard of sound safety practice and simple common sense."

"The result was an engineer force that resembled a patchwork quilt, with engineers ranging from qualified to plainly unqualified. The company was willing to compromise public safety to achieve its economic objective."

That sandwich would taste even better with a glass of cold beer.

UM men's tennis match marred by controversy

Boston University walks off the court; match left unfinished with UMass in the lead

By JIM CUMMINGS
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's tennis team was two points away from its second victory of the season when its opponent, Boston University, walked off the Upper Boyden Courts yesterday afternoon.

The teams were completing the final two doubles matches with the UMass number three team of Rich Stone and Chris Johnson leading, 7-5, 4-3. The number one combination of Brian Gable and Joe Desormiers had already swept their match, 6-0, 6-1 and put UMass ahead 4-3 in the best-of-nine team competition format.

The BU team began arguing and stalling before packing up its gear, insisting it was too dark to continue. The UMass teams remained on the court, obviously ready to play the last few points of what coach Manny Roberts called "a certain UMass victory.

"We would have won. We knew it and they knew it, that's why they did what they did," Roberts said.

Roberts offered to play nine-point tiebreakers in the final two matches but BU coach Bob Dallis turned him down. Roberts also explored the chance of finding off-campus indoor courts, but none were available.

Tension began building up between the two teams during the singles matches, which were split 3-3. Players on both sides questioned calls being made by their opponents and judges were forced to be brought into a normally self-officiated sport on the collegiate level. Craig Foreman of BU then took offense to a linesman's call and batted a ball over the cross-court fence and would not continue until a new linesman was brought in. Dallis was forced to stand in the next court and calm his player in order for play to resume.

Desormiers was his opponent and seemed to be fired up as well, because after the incident he stormed back from a first-set loss and won the match, 5-7, 6-4, 6-3. Other singles winners were Gable, 6-2, 6-4, and Stone 6-2, 7-5.

Freshman Paul Audet lost a tough match, 6-7, 6-4, 6-4 as did Johnson, 3-6, 6-2, 6-3. Roberts said both matches could have gone either way and were well-played.

Senior Humberto Soto was defeated 6-4, 6-0 coming off his victory in the New England Tournament this past weekend.

As of now the match is considered unfinished, but Roberts is seeking a ruling from the National Collegiate Athletic Association.

Sox keep on stumbling, tripped by Blue Jays, 1-0

Lefty's two-hitter a Key in Toronto sweep

By DAVE O'HARA
AP Sports Writer

BOSTON — The Boston Red Sox stumbled again last night in their bid to clinch the American League East as Jimmy Key pitched a two-hitter and the Toronto Blue Jays parlayed Rich Gedman's error into a 1-0 victory and a three-game sweep.

Boston's magic number for winning the division, however, when Detroit and New York both lost to remain 3.5 games out. Milwaukee is 2.5 games out after beating California, 4-3.

Boston finishes its season with a four-game series in Cleveland. New York is in Detroit for a three-game series while Milwaukee finished the season in Oakland.

Key outdueled Bruce Hurst, who allowed only five hits but was victimized when Gedman's throwing error in the eighth inning set up an unearned run. The Blue Jays, eliminated Sunday, won all seven games at Fenway Park this season and went 11-2 against the Red Sox overall.

Hurst, 18-6, walked Rob Ducey — the ninth-place batter in the Toronto lineup — on a 3-2 pitch to start the eighth inning. With one out and Kelly Gruber batting, Ducey stole second and continued to third when Gedman threw the ball into center field. Gruber then hit a sacrifice fly to center.

Key, 12-5, allowed only a one-out single by Marty Barrett in the first inning and a two-out single by Larry Parrish in the eighth. Randy Kutcher, pinch running for Parrish, was picked off by Key.

Key walked one and struck out three in his second complete game, both shutouts. Hurst struck out eight and walked two.

In the third, Toronto's Jesse Barfield lined a single to left and took second as George Bell beat out a high chopper to the left of the mound. The runners moved up on Fred McGriff's one-out grounder but Cecil Fielder took a called third strike.

Barrett began the Boston fourth by walking on four pitches. With two outs, he stole second but Ellis Burks grounded to second to end the inning.

Yankees, Tigers fall; magic number at 2

Despite last night's loss to the Toronto Blue Jays, the Boston Red Sox edged a little bit closer to winning the American League East title.

In Cleveland, the Detroit Tigers were pushed to the very edge by losing 4-2 to the Indians. Any loss by the Tigers or Red Sox win eliminates them from contention.

In Baltimore, rookie Bob Milacki threw a three-hitter as the Orioles upended the New York Yankees, 2-0. With that loss, the overall magic number for the Red Sox to clinch the pennant drops to two.

The Milwaukee Brewers are still alive with a magic number of two after last night's 4-3 win over the California Angels at County Stadium.

Tonight the Red Sox begin their final series of the regular season, traveling to Cleveland to meet the Indians. The Bosox send ace righthander Roger Clemens to the mound in this important game.

Also tonight, the Yankees conclude their series with the Orioles in Baltimore before traveling to Detroit for a big three-game weekend series ith the Tigers. Either team would almost have to sweep the series and hope for a total collapse by the Red Sox in order to have any hope for the AL East crown.

Should the Red Sox win, they will begin their quest for a return to the World Series next Wednesday night at Fenway Park against the Oakland Athletics. The Athletics clinched their berth in the playoffs early last week.

However, Brown's defense, a packed-in zone designed to limit the chances around the net, worked well, frustrating the Minutewomen at times, but they were able to eventually solve it and get the offense going just in time.

"Brown's Catenaccio (name of the Italian World Cup team from which the defense was devised) defense as very strong," said UMass coach Jim Rudy. "We had as difficult a time penetrating it as I thought we would."

That defense often fizzled any chances UMass tried to create and stopped most shots that got off.

"When we had good opportunities, we either shot weak or we shot right at the goalie when the shots were strong," Rudy said.

Going into the game, Rudy had stressed that it would take a lot of patience on his team's part to not get too frustrated and to keep their heads against the Brown defense.

"I was quite pleased with our patience," Rudy said. "My halftime message was to be patient and break the flanks, that there would be a lot of loose balls. We knocked on the door a lot but we couldn't get in."

Rudy thought that sophomore Becky Bonzano had a particularly strong game coming up from the backfield. "They were marking April Kater tightly at midfield, so Becky's penetration was very helpful," Rudy said. "It allowed us to maintain possession."

He was also happy with the play of seniors Beth Roundtree and Cathy Cassady, who played strong games.

Sidelines: UMass dropped to fifth in the latest ISAA National Poll from fourth, behind the University of Connecticut.
North Carolina, N.C. State and California-Berkeley hold the top three spots.

Having endured three consecutive road losses to top-ranked New England teams, the Minutemen must now improve on their 1-1 record in the Atlantic 10 if they hope to appear in post season tournament action.

The Elis, meanwhile, improved their record to 3-0-1.

■ Flanagan

greatest feats I've ever seen. In a game against Maine, he hit three consecutive home runs, pitched a two-hitter and had 15 strikeouts. And he had bronchitis."

Flanagan batted .338 and posted a 9-1 record with a 1.52 ERA and 91 strikeouts in 82 innings. His only loss came in the New England Regional Tournament against Harvard at Fenway Park, the first time Flanagan ever pitched in the old Beantown ballyard.

"I remember that game well," Flanagan said Monday from Fenway, where his current team, the Toronto Blue Jays, were facing the Boston Red Sox. "I've always preferred the older, traditional ballparks and you always remember the first time you've pitched. Pitching here has always been special to me."

Unfortunately, he won't have fond memories of that game. The Minutemen lost to Harvard, 4-2, ending their season as what Bergquist calls his "best team ever" never got its chance to play in a College World Series.

That also marked the end of the Flanagan era at UMass. Having turned 21, he was eligible for the major league draft, despite being only a sophomore. He was drafted in the seventh round by the Orioles, and his ride to the majors began.

After tours of duty in such minor league stops as Miami, Asheville, N.C. and Rochester, N.Y., Flanagan made his major league debut on Sept. 5, 1975 against the New York Yankees. He bounced back and forth between Rochester and Baltimore before finally arriving for good in 1977.

His first two full seasons were highly successful, as he went 15-10 in '77 and then followed by going 19-15 in '78. Then, in 1979, Flanagan had his finest season, going 23-9 with a 3.08 ERA, winning the Cy Young and leading his team to the World Series. He started the first game of the Series against the Pittsburgh Pirates, who the Orioles lost to in seven games, and went 1-1 with a 3.00 ERA in the Series.

Pitching that first game remains the greatest thrill of Flanagan's long and highlighted career.

"That first game against the Pirates was probably my greatest moment," Flanagan said. "To play in the World Series and win takes a tremendous team effort. I've always felt I was a team player. I'm proud of the Cy Young Award, because I had a heckuva season. It was a personal reward. But the Cy Young was an afterthought for me."

Despite several other injuries, one a severed Achilles tendon that doctors thought would end his career two years ago, Flanagan has continued his strong pitching. On Aug. 31 of last year, Flanagan was traded to the Blue Jays, at that time a contending team searching for experience.

He has provided just that, a veteran pitcher who the players have looked up to for guidance. John Cerutti, an Amherst College graduate now with the Blue Jays, said that Flanagan has helped him with throwing pitches, along with his mechanics, training and approach to the game.

This year, Flanagan has produced a 13-13 record, including a win over the Red Sox Tuesday night. At age 36, he has reached a crossroads in his career. After the season, he becomes a free agent, and must make a decision on which way he will go.

"My goal is to stay in the game as long as I can and hopefully keep winning," Flanagan said. "How long I keep pitching depends on how I'm throwing at the time. If I get on a good streak, I could keep going for a few more years. It's still only a game, and I get a lot of satisfaction out of it. It keeps me young."

Yale tops Minutemen with first half burst

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Correspondent

For a few brief moments in the afternoon sun yesterday in New Haven, CT, the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team snapped out of its recent soccer slumber. When Steve Cesnek beat the Yale defense to a long pass from teammate Bill Kousmanidis, then scooted the ball past Eli goaltender Bryan Martin, the Minutemen held a 1-0 lead over the No. 3 ranked team in New England, with just 14:28 run off the clock.

UMass' upset hopes evaporated suddenly, however, as the Elis pounced on the mistake prone Minuteman defense for three goals in the final 15 minutes of the first half, then held on through a furious second half of play for a 3-1 victory.

"We let down unbelievably," described UMass assistant coach John Martin of UMass's play following Cesnek's goal. "We let down defensively."

David Goldblatt, capitalizing on what Martin described as "three consecutive defensive mistakes," tied the score with an unassisted goal at the 22:55 mark of the first half.

Less than seven minutes later, the Elis converted a corner kick into a 2-1 lead. With 23:15 showing on the clock, Mike Sharon lofted the freebie out in front of UMass goaltender Brett Shumsky, where teammate Jay Hambrick redirected the ball into the back of the net.

In Martin's eyes, it was yet another case of the Minutemen defense yielding a "soft goal."

"No one went up for us," described Martin, "and their player (Hambrick) served it."

Senior offensive star Steve Cass padded the lead for Yale at the 37:33 mark. Off a long feed from Hambrick, Cass headed the ball past Shumsky amidst, in Martin's words, "plenty of defenders."

The Minutemen outshot their hosts in the second half by a 10-5 margin, playing their strongest 45 minutes of soccer since hitting the road last Wednesday. The comeback effort was thwarted by goalkeeper Martin and his defensive troops, however, as the Minutemen wound up this painful road trip on a typically frustrating note.

"In the second half, we totally dominated them," said Martin. "We were really playing soccer, winning balls . . . playing in their end most of the time. We just couldn't score."

The loss drops UMass' season record to 3-4, and sets the stage for this weekend's crucial meeting with Atlantic 10 foe West Virginia, in the Massachusetts Challenge Cup invitational tournament.

Woodside's goal gives Minutewomen a 1-0 win

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

Brown University's women's soccer team features a good defense, but last night the Bruins ran into a better defense.

The fifth-ranked University of Massachusetts came into Providence, R.I. last night and fought a fierce defensive duel with the locals, before finally pulling away with a 1-0 win.

There was just under 14 minutes remaining in the contest when freshman Michelle Woodside pumped in an unassisted goal to give the 5-0 Minutewomen the win. Brown drops to 4-2.

The play was set up by senior Michelle Powers, who dribbled inside across the top of the crease. She left-footed a low line drive that the keeper couldn't hold onto, and Woodside, positioned right near the goal line, finished the shot from about two yards away. That goal came at the 76:20 mark.

Other than that, there weren't many offensive highlights by either side. UMass had a couple of other good chances. Sophomore Sue Gaudette shot one with about two minutes left that hit the post. There were various other goalmouth scrambles and good opportunities that went for naught.

The Minutewomen limited Brown to just four shots — none in the second half, bringing the total to just 14 shots over the first five games. Senior goalkeeper Carla DeSantis and the UMass defense registered its fourth shutout of the season.

Series ends on a bad note

By MATT GERKE
Collegian Staff

Last weekend's game between the University of Massachusetts and Harvard was the end of the Minutemen's non-conference opponents for quite a while — five weeks to be exact.

UMass will face four weeks of Yankee Conference competition starting with Boston University at 1:30 p.m. Saturday.

But the Crimson game, sadly enough, was probably the last meeting between these teams, whose rivalry dates back to 1906.

Harvard ends the series with a 11-8-1 advantage.

"I would like to play Harvard," UMass head coach Jim Reid said. "But the good thing about it is we don't have to hear their vulgar, crummy, tasteless band anymore. It's an insult to their school."

The Harvard band did a halftime show which was a skit about the Olympics, complete with hooded men with fake guns who pretended to kill athletes.

The band leader, while narrating the show, would stop whenever he got to a big word and explain it to the UMass fans, who made the two-hour trip and numbered almost as many as the Crimson fans.

". . .minuscule. That's small for you UMass fans," was an example of his sparkling wit.

Extra points: Junior fullback David Mitchell had 112 yards against Harvard and senior tailback Kevin Smellie added 105. It was the first game in six seasons where two UMass players rushed for 100 or more yards. In 1982, Garry Pearson rushed for 147 yards and Tom Murphy added 102 as UMass dumped West Chester State 25-3.

Offensive guard Mike Barrette, who has been out for the season recovering from a foot operation, practiced this week but is not expected to play Saturday.

Former UMass star still going strong in the bigs

Mike Flanagan, shown here playing for UMass in 1973, has gone on to have a stellar career in the major leagues.

By JIM CLARK

BOSTON — When you talk University of Massachusetts sports alumni who have made it big, the name "Dr. J" immediately comes to mind.

Jeff Reardon is also a big-name UMass grad, now pitching with the Minnesota Twins. But he is one of just two former Minutemen now serving time in the big leagues. The other, Mike Flanagan, has had a storied career in his own right and keeps right on throwing with the best of them. Flanagan remains one of the steadier left-handers in baseball, one who has had his share of glory in the past.

Like Reardon, he has a World Series ring, from the Baltimore Orioles in 1983. He also won the Cy Young Award as the American League's top pitcher in 1979, and has piled up 156 wins over his 13-year major league career.

Yet, Flanagan firmly believes that were it not for UMass and former coach Dick Bergquist, he wouldn't be where he is today.

Flanagan had been hampered by arm problems throughout most of his career. It was an injury in his junior year at Memorial High School in Manchester, N.H., during an American Legion World Series game in California, that put his future in baseball in severe jeopardy.

This is where Bergquist came in, and Flanagan's trek toward life in professional baseball got a big boost.

"When he was a junior in high school I heard about him, and went to see him," Bergquist said. "I thought he was the best prospect I had ever seen. He seemed to have more mastery of pitching than anyone I'd seen at that age."

Despite the fact that he wasn't able to throw during his senior year, Bergquist kept after him and the effort paid off.

"One of the reasons that we got him is because we wanted him as a hitter," Bergquist said. "I was confident that he could come back (from his injury), but I liked him as a complete ballplayer. He was a good overall athlete."

Other colleges and professional teams wanted him as well, but shied away because of the arm problem. He was drafted by the Houston Astros, but they never made him an offer. So UMass it was.

"I was coming off an arm injury, but Bergquist still wanted me in the program," Flanagan said. "He was very sincere with me and didn't rush me. I owe a great deal of thanks to him for where I am today."

Despite the injury, Flanagan was still able to make a big contribution. His arm did bounce back, as Bergquist had predicted.

"He started very slowly, and it took a lot of patience on the parts of all of us," Bergquist said. "But as far as his development as concerned, I think it was fortunate he didn't sign early. His arm wasn't ready. It was just one of the lucky things that he came to college and wasn't thrust into the minors."

> "I was coming off an arm injury, but (Dick) Bergquist still wanted me in the program. He was very sincere with me and didn'trush me. I owe a great deal of thanks to him for where I am today."

> — Mike Flanagan

In his freshman year with the Redmen (the nickname was changed to the Minutemen in 1974), Flanagan posted some impressive numbers, batting .298 and running up a 3-0 record with a 0.47 ERA.

After a summer in the Cape Cod League, Flanagan came back in 1973 as a sophomore. It was on an early-season trip to the Riverside Tournament in California that Bergquist realized he had latched on to something special.

"He came back that year and just dominated New England," Bergquist said. "That year, had had one of the Discovery launch successful after 98-minute delay

By HOWARD BENEDICT
Associated Press

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — More than 2½ years after the trauma and tragedy of the Challenger disaster, the shuttle Discovery rocketed into orbit yesterday, carrying five astronauts on a comeback flight that NASA hoped would signal a rebirth of the manned space program.

Riding two redesigned booster rockets, the winged space craft blasted off launch pad 39B at 11:37 a.m. EDT. Liftoff was delayed 98 minutes while NASA awaited a shift in peculiarly light winds along the Discovery flight path.

President Reagan drew applause when he announced the successful launch at awards ceremony in Washington. Saying the shuttle was "headed into orbit and America is back in space," he saluted the bravery of the crew and added, "We ask God to bless this important voyage."

William Rogers, who headed the investigation into the Challenger accident, watched the launch here along with the estimated 250,000 spectator.

"It was a wonderful day," he said. "In my day the sky was the limit. It's not the limit anymore."

The craft was safely in orbit, its crew ticking off a routine system checklist, when NASA officials stood before launch officers to hail the beginning of the four-day mission.

"It's great to be back in space again," said the director of the Kennedy Space Center, Forrest McCartney. "Wow," said NASA administrator James Fletcher, "It's been a long wait."

"Good luck and Godspeed," was the send off from Launch Control to Commander Frederick Hauck. As the ship entered orbit, the communicator from Mission Control confirmed, "Performance nominal."

Later today, the astronauts were to release from the shuttle's cargo bay at $100 million communications satellite.

Months of remorse, restructuring and rebuilding ended when the winged spacecraft entered its initial orbit, about 110 miles above Earth, heading for 160 miles.

Trailing a 700-foot geyser of fire. Discovery vaulted from its pad and within seconds rolled into its desired course to orbit. An estimated quarter-million people watched from roads, river banks and other viewing spots in the Kennedy Space Center area.

The atmosphere was anxious as the shuttle moved successfully through the stage of maximum aerodynamic stress at which

Request to ground Westover's C-5As denied

By ALLEN BERNARD
Collegian Correspondent

SPRINGFIELD — A US District Court judge ruled yesterday that Westover Air Force Base in Chicopee can continue its operations with the controversial C-5A transport planes.

The plaintiff, the Valley Citizens for a Safe Environment, lost the case against the US Government when Judge Frank H. Freedman dismissed the case.

Base commander Brig. Gen. Fredrick D. Walker, in a prepared statement, said, "We are grateful with the judges decision. This is a victory for the American people and a very important decision for the national defense."

Christoval Bonifaz, attorney for the Valley Citizens group, said he could not comment on the ruling because he did not know the grounds on which the decision was based.

"It would be stupid for me to say anything," Bonifaz said.

The controversy began in 1985 when the Air Force first proposed bringing the plans to the base in Chicopee. In June 1987, the Valley Citizens group brought two suits against the Air Force.

The first suit claimed the Air Force's Environmental Impact Statement (EIS) was inadequate, and the second alleged the Air Force had violated its own EIS by flying 'almost double' the missions originally stated, Bonifaz said.

Marian Wadsworth, political liaison for Valley Citizens, said that when the group hears of the decision, they "(are) going to be disappointed. We worked very hard. We still feel that many of the plaintiffs are going to suffer severe hardships because of this." The group plans to appeal the decision, she said.

"It didn't surprise me a bit," said Bradford Parker, president of the recently formed Citizens for C-5A's that supports the presence of the planes. Parker said he had been prepared to go to Springfield if necessary with petitions in support of the planes.

The C-5A is an over-sized cargo plane that is the largest cargo plane in the western world. The planes are based at Westover because it has the longest runway on the eastern seaboard and because of its proximity to Europe, according to an official at the base.

Currently there are 10 C-5A's at Westover with an additional six due to be stationed there in March 1988, he said.

They fly missions all over the world, he said. Recent missions include flying Canadian peace-keeping forces into the Persian Gulf and ferrying equipment to fire-fighters in Yellowstone National Park, he said. Next week a mission to Australia will cause one of planes to circumnavigate the globe, he said.

The C-5A's at Westover have also been involved in supply missions to naval units in the Persian Gulf, he said.

Behind Mike Boddicker's (13-15) three-hit shut-out, the BoSox walloped the Indians to eliminate Detroit and lower the magic number over Milwaukee and New York to one.

Roger Clemens (18-11) will try to clinch it for the Sox tonight when he faces Cleveland at 7:30 p.m. For those of you with cable, it will broadcast on WSBK TV-38 Boston.

Milwaukee, idle last night, will try to stay alive against Oakland tonight, as will the Yankees, who again take on Baltimore.

Battle lingers over legal services

By YANA DLUGY
Collegian Staff

While the fate of the Legal Services Center is still up in the air, the center remains in existence, providing legal advice to students.

Confusion has surrounded the center since the controversy concerning its existence first erupted two years ago, and now yet another court decision is being awaited to decide the center's future.

A hearing was held in Boston Sept. 14, where three judges from the First Circuit Court of Appeals heard arguments from both sides on whether the case should go to trial.

At issue is whether the LSC should have the authority to represent students in the courtroom, a power the Board of Trustees granted them in 1975.

Ten years later the board revoked the center's power to represent students in cases against the University. The center was then called the Legal Services Office, a name its employees still use today.

The trustees abolished all forms of representation in August, 1986, and the office was officially renamed the Legal Services Center.

NEWS ANALYSIS

Students then filed a lawsuit contending the abolishment of the office was an infringement of their constitutional rights, but lost that battle last fall. Boston US District Court Judge Joseph Tauro ruled the case did not warrant a trial.

After this first defeat students filed an appeal protesting Tauro's ruling.

Their main argument was that the abolition of the office was a retaliation by the administration for prior successful First Amendment lawsuits.

The most famous of these cases was the Yvette Henry case. Henry was a UMass student who was wrongly accused of starting multiple campus fires in 1983. The FBI participated in the long investigation that found Henry did not start the fires.

Henry sued the University for $13 million. LSC and two other private law firms represented her. She settled out of court for what LSC Director Charles DiMare called a substantial sum of money.

Peter Ellis, the attorney for the trustees and the administration, said he does not consider retaliation an issue before the court. He said the trustees' decision to abolish the office did not violate student rights in any way.

"The law states that the government may not restrain the students from exercising their rights, but they are not required to help them do so," Ellis said. "There is a difference between restricting and facilitating."

According to Ellis, when the trustees allowed the LSC to represent students in court, the administration was simply making it easier for students to get legal representation. By abolishing the office the trustees did not take away the right to seek representation.

Challenger broke apart, dooming its crew of seven on Jan. 28, 1986, just 73 seconds after liftoff.

The flight passed its most critical milestone when its two 149-foot-tall solid fuel booster rockets burned out on schedule and jettisoned toward the Atlantic Ocean.

The failure of a joint in one booster allowed flames to escape and led to the Challenger explosion. The accident triggered hundreds of modifications to the shuttle and a new launch-oversight procedure in which former astronaut Robert Crippen held one-man authority to approve launch.

He did, sending the shuttle toward orbit through partially cloudy skies. Aboard with Navy Capt. Hauck; Air Force Col. Richard Covey; Marine Lt Col. David C. Hilmera; John M. Lounge; and George D. 'Pinky' Nelson.

With the boosters shed, Discovery's three liquid fuel main engines burned for another 6½ minutes to propel Discovery and its crew into orbit.

The National Aeronautics and Space Administration, indeed the entire country, had to be relieved. Another catastrophic failure could have killed the shuttle program and seriously jeapordized future space efforts.

"We've got about nine minutes of work left to get this program back into space," said Bob Sieck, the launch director, as he briefed the flight crew and restarted the countdown clock.

Although four days of space experiments lie ahead, the shuttle's main propulsion systems passed their tests during the climb to orbit. Landing was scheduled for Monday at Edwards Air Force Base in California.

The morning countdown was smooth, excepting Florida's fickle weather. Space craft computers, configured to expect autumn winds in a certain range, did not have adequate data to steer the craft through weak winds at high altitude. NASA waited until conditions improved, abandoning its original 9:59 a.m. launch target.

Had the winds remained unacceptable, officials would have scrubbed the launch effort for the day.

"Stay with us, I think we'll make it," the launch director told the astronauts after receiving an improving wind analysis. Hauck joked in reply, "We don't want this thing to leave without us."

Hauck and his crew of four veteran astronauts awoke early, donned their orange, specially pressurized flight suits and drew enthusiastic cheers as they left to board the $1.5 billion spacecraft. Once on board they had to overcome problems with cooling systems in two of the space suits, the sort of minor mechanica! glitch that nags almost every countdown.

Boys are arrested in store after nine days

FALL RIVER (AP) — Police arrested three boys after they were found hiding in a suspended ceiling at a Zayre department store, where two of them had lived since running away from home nine days earlier.

Two of the youths, both 13, had left home Sept. 19 and went to the store, where they climbed into the ceiling and hid until after closing hours, police said.

"When the store closed for the night, they started to set themselves up for a long stay," said Officer Richard Marzilli, who made the arrest Wednesday.

During the nine days, the boys entertained themselves with electronic appliances and ate food from the store.

On Monday, the boys convinced a third boy, 11, to join them in their escapade after he got out of school.

Marzillo said he was called to the store when the manager, James Fingles, told him that the burglar alarm had been sounding during the nighttime hours for over a week.

On Wednesday morning, Fingles noticed an extension cord that led to a ceiling panel in the store. He climbed up into the suspended ceiling and followed the cord, crawling about 70 feet before coming across the youths.

Plant closings could cost Mass

BOSTON (AP) — The forced closing of Massachusetts' two commercial nuclear power plants through a ballot referendum in November could cost the state as much as $4 billion, according to a study released yesterday.

"I think this is the most important news out in the campaign, because it (the study) is independent," Robert Palmer, spokesman for the Citizens Against the Shutdown Initiative, said of the study by the Massachusetts Taxpayers Foundation.

But Joseph Kriesberg, a spokesman for Citizens for Safe Energy, which sponsored the referendum, disputed the study's assumption that taxpayers will have to bear the cost of the referendum.

"Win, lose or draw, taxpayers will not have to pay any of these costs because federal and state law prohibits that from happening," Kriesberg said.

Kriesberg's group argues utility ratepayers and shareholders will be liable. The issue will likely be decided only after a legal battle.

Palmer's group, which has been heavily financed by the utilities but contains both anti-nuclear and pro-nuclear members, had conservatively estimated the impact of the ballot question at $1 billion to compensate the plants' owners and possibly another $1 billion for replacement power.

The study by the taxpayers foundation, which is supported by contributions from businesses, went beyond that to examine potential lost taxes and the state's bond cost for financing the payback. The study was prepared by economist Edward Moscovitch and the law firm of Csaplar & Bok.

The referendum question, No. 4 on ballots Nov. 8, if approved, would ban power plants that produce nuclear waste. That would result in closing the Boston Edison Co.'s Pilgrim plant in Plymouth and Yankee Rowe's plant in Rowe.

The report makes two major assumptions about the issue that an approved referendum would amount to property-taking and the state would be required to compensate the owners.

The total financial impact would be $4 billion, the report said.

Recyclers seek help

By MAUREEN TARPEY
Collegian Correspondent

Students and residents are invited to bring their trash to the Amherst Common Saturday morning between 9 a.m. and 11 a.m. to rally for state support of recycling waste.

Rally organizer Fran Fortino of the Amherst Solid Waste Committee said the purpose of the rally is to collect recyclable materials from Amherst and other area communities, which will then be brought to the State House in Boston. He said the intent of the demonstration in Boston is to show the legislature that people are willing and anxious to get recycling facilities built and working in Massachusetts.

The rally is sponsored by the Massachusetts Trash Action Coalition, which is made up of MassPIRG, Greenpeace, and other local environmental groups.

Last year, the state legislature passed the Solid Waste Management bill, which appropriated $265 million for the building of about 12 regional recycling units throughout Massachusetts.

Fortino explained that recycling would require residents to separate recyclable materials like aluminum cans, glass bottles, cardboard and paper from their trash. The trash would continue to be collected as it is now, but the recyclables would be sent back to various industries in usable forms, he said.

"I am confident that it is going to get up and running," said state Rep. Stan Rosenberg, D-Amherst, of the first recovery facility to be built soon in Springfield. The building of the facility, originally slated to be finished last November, has undergone a series of delays, he said, because of problems with bureaucracy and with complicated laws concerning bidding and construction of new projects.

Rosenberg is one of the three authors of the recycling legislation and will be one of the speakers at Saturday's rally.

Greg Stewart, a UMass senior and member of MassPIRG explained that the point of the demonstration in Boston "is to demonstrate a cause, not to break any laws." He said he does not anticipate problems with police.

Stewart said the concern over recycling comes in response to the severe crisis our state faces with the present policy of trash in landfills and incineration.

"Three-fourths of the state's landfills will close by 1990," he said. "They are filling up quickly and are leaching contaminents into ground water."

The contaminents pollute local wells as well as the air, he said, adding these contaminents cause acid rain.

At present, the state incinerates 50 percent and only recycles about five percent, said Stewart.

"We expect more on the state's part," said Fortino. "Other states like New York and New Jersey are much farther ahead of us in recycling."

Fortino said he urges people to bring their recyclables to the rally and emphasized the demonstration will place the necessary political pressure on the legislature to make recycling the state's top priority.

Bad checks passed at Credit Union

By THOMAS RODRIGUES

The University Police Detective Bureau began an investigation into a check fraud operation Wednesday that may have cost the University of Massachusetts Federal Credit Union $16,462.10.

The four checks had been written between Sept. 16 and Sept. 20 on a "closed or fictitious account," according to police reports.

The credit union refused to comment at press time, but the Collegian has learned that the police have at least one suspect and may in fact have more than one suspects.

- A student reported Wednesday that the driver's side window of his car, parked in lot 25, had been smashed and the car entered. Taken from the car was an AM/FM cassette player and two pairs of sunglasses with a total value of $800.
- A student reported Wednesday that his wallet containing $50 in cash had been taken from his room in Kennedy Tower.
- A 22-year-old Franklin man was stopped in his car on North Pleasant St. Wednesday and arrested for driving a vehicle after his license had been suspended.
- A student returned Wednesday to his car in lot 49 to discover two glass T-tops worth $800 stolen from the vehicle.
- A student reported yesterday that his Schwinn 12-speed bicycle had been stolen from the rack to which it was locked at Prince Residence Hall.
- A male student reported yesterday that his 1986 Mitsubishi automobile worth $6,800 stolen from the Southwest Horseshoe.
- A male student reported that his All-terrain bicycle worth $200 was stolen from the rack to which it was locked near Gorman Residence Hall yesterday.
- Police investigated a report yesterday of a jeep pushing a 1983 Chevrolet over an embankment in lot 49. The car received an estimated $300 in damages.

Magazine rack wins big for CC store

By PRESTON FORMAN

The next time you are in the Campus Center's University Store, take a look at the magazine rack — it's a prizewinner.

Ellen Gatchell, trade book manager of the University Store, won first prize in the large school category for magazine display.

This national competition, sponsored by College Store Executive Magazine, is divided into two categories — for large and small schools — as determined by enrollment.

"All we did was send in photos and they got the information about how many magazines we have from other sources," Gatchell said.

The contest, judged by a panel of 10 publishing and magazine industry representatives, was held July 28 in New York City.

Gatchell, who has been trade book manager at the University Store for five years, won second prize in 1986, making this the second time she has finished in the top two in the three-year-old contest.

"Since I've won twice, they expect me to win every year," she said with a laugh.

Gatchell attributes part of her success in the competition to a new location for the magazine rack.

"We moved it to a larger area with better light and more selections," she said, adding the rack contains about 400 different titles.

"The best thing about the new rack is that there is area to stand around and browse," she said. "And we have a lot of browsers."

When asked about the prize-winning rack, most people were unaware but acknowledged the rack had a good selection.

"They have a lot good magazines," said Jose Toledo, a sophomore engineering major. "They have the magazines I want to read, like Sports Illustrated and Rolling Stone."

Some customers were less than pleased, though.

"They have a lot of magazines here, but it might be nice if they had more intellectual magazines — this is a college," said Chris Velis, a senior economics major.

"They don't have a lot of the business magazines like Inc. and Forbes," Velis added.

Toledo was unconvinced the racks were as big as Gatchell claimed.

"Maybe 200, but not 400," he said.

Other winners in the large school category were the book store at the University of Missouri at Columbia, which finished second, and Adelphi (N.Y.) University Book Store finished third.

In the small school category first place went to Xavier (Ohio) Book Store. Delta State (Miss.) University Book Store and the University of Wisconsin at Platteville received second and third places, repsectively.

PVTA endures shortage

By ALLEN BERNARD
Collegian Correspondent

The UMass Transit Service is experiencing a shortage of drivers, but according to one its directors, this shortage will not affect service at the University of Massachusetts.

The service, as overseen by the Pioneer Valley Transit Authority (PVTA), works for the University to provide busses, transportation for people with disabilities, and field trip service to UMass and surrounding towns.

At full strength the system employs 160 to 180 student drivers, but UMass Transit is not at full strength. Currently they are looking for nearly 40 drivers to fill positions that have been vacated because of graduations and a competitive job market, said William Barrett, Director of Parking and Transportation.

Barrett said the shortage of drivers has not caused a break in service to outlying communities such as Sunderland or Belchertown but the shortage has limited the number of campus shuttle buses that can be run.

Normally there are five shuttles but now, depending on the time of day and driver availability, that number varies.

The driver shortage will be alleviated shortly, Barrett said, because five new drivers have recently been added and 30 more will be driving within the next few weeks. But UMass Transit will still need more drivers before semester's end, Barrett said.

It is even possible to see Barrett driving a bus three or four times a week because of the driver shortage.

The garage, complete with bus washer and service bays, is tucked away in the northwest corner of campus and is large enough to house the entire fleet of 41 buses.

Andy Degner, a 20-year-old mechanical engineering major from Greenwich, New York, works an average of 20 hours a week due to the driver shortage. At least once,

Committee nominations opened as BOG hires coordinators

By GEORGE FRANCY
Collegian Staff

"I have nothing particularly interesting to say," said the Board of Governors' Lisa Ventresco, characterizing the mood of last night's meeting.

In a sharp contrast to last week's emotionally charged battle for space, the Board of Governors went to work on some of the more everyday, but practical work the board does.

This included the opening of nominations for the various committees of the BOG, such as the space committee, which stands to play a big role in the immediate future of the board.

Conservative and liberal factions of the board will try to stack the committee because it is charged with allocating space in the Campus Center/Student Union in an annual process. Eight governors were nominated for the five positions available. Elections will be held next week.

The fireworks of last week were caused when the board took it upon itself to move several student groups to different office space in the Campus Center/Student Union. Many of these groups have protested the move, and an appeal has been filed.

The matter has been referred to the Space Committee, which will hear the arguments of all the groups involved and make a decision.

In other business, the board approved the hiring of several coordinators. The coordinators handle board operations such as finances, planning events for the complex, and doling out vending tables on the Campus Center Concourse.

Four motions were tabled for next week, including a study of the feasibility of placing emergency telephones in the Campus Center Parking Garage and concourse.

Historic clu will rebuild from ashes

By Richard Sasson
The Patriot Ledger

WESTWOOD — Dominic Marinelli of Walpole, president of the 92-year-old Norfolk Golf Club on East Street, vowed yesterday to rebuild the clubhouse that was destroyed in a $100,000, three-alarm fire over the weekend.

Marinelli said the golf course will reopen in a couple of days and the clubhouse will be rebuilt.

"It's a disappointment," he said. "The building has been there a lot of years and there's a lot of history to it. But we'll come out of it. The club will survive like it has in the past."

No members were in the clubhouse during the fire which started near the club's function room at a.m. yesterday, leaving only the shop and a section of the locker room standing, John J. Sheehy said.

Fitchburg firefighter Joseph F. Geraine was released on $10,000 bail Tuesday after being charged with trafficking in $1.5 million in cocaine in Attleboro.

Police said they arrested Geraine at his home on Pearl St. Fitchburg on Thursday after they allegedly found pounds of almost pure cocaine during the search of the house.

Geraine was arraigned in Attleboro District Court on Friday, June 24, 1988 on three charges of trafficking in cocaine, one charge of conspiracy to traffic in cocaine and one charge of possession of a class B substance with intent to distribute.

Police also obtained $1,000 in cash, 2 pounds of cocaine and three shotguns during the search, police said.

Geraine was also charged with conspiracy to violate the drug laws and possession of a class B substance with intent to distribute.

"The students are now in the same position as any other member of the public," Ellis said, adding that students are free to seek legal representation, but from the private bar.

DiMare said one of the major advantages of the office was the cases they took were turned down by the private bar.

"Most of the cases, except for the Yvette Henry one, I could not get the private bar to take, because there weren't substantial money damages involved," he said.

The administration claims, according to DiMare, that the center interfered with the smooth running of the University, because administrators were afraid to do their jobs in fear of lawsuits. DiMare says this claim is totally unfounded.

"Suing the University has always been our last resort," he said. "Out of approximately 4,000 cases in which the students claimed they were wronged by the University, only 13 were filed. That's less than one percent."

Another argument the trustees and administration used is the state can not sue itself. LSO was funded in part by student fees. Once a student pays the fee, that money is University property. The office's attorneys were and are University employees, state paid, and considered part of the administration.

Ellis said the University made an offer to help the students set up their own voluntary funded legal representation office but said the students refused.

"If the students hired an attorney and payed his or her fees directly, they would be free to do so," Ellis said. "They said that is not acceptable, we want every student to pay for it."

The students argument is also valid. No student enters the University thinking they will need legal advice, so few students would pay for a service that in their minds they will never need.

Correction

A story on minority enrollment in yesterday's Collegian incorrectly reported the number that admissions had risen in 1988 from 1987. The story said about 1,400 more applications were received. The actual number is 596.

Also, according to Timm Rinehart, director of admissions, the number of minority students actually enrolled in 1988 is less than the number given by the admissions office. The original number, 395, did not take into account "no-shows," according to Rinehart.

Degner has driven 35 hours in one week, he said. The normally scheduled work week for drivers is about 15 hours.

"I like my job but I don't love it," said Degner. "We do a pretty good job of getting people where they want to go."

Degner said he sometimes thinks driving can be a pretty thankless job. He feels the managers at UMass Transit don't appreciate the drivers.

"No one's really saying, 'Hey guys, you're doing a good job,'" he said.

Managers at UMass Transit are not the only people who sometimes forget driving is work. "When (a passenger) says 'Thank you,' you appreciate that," Degner said.

Andy Rezendes, a 21-year-old chemistry major from New Bedford, is more forgiving than Degner.

Rezendes drives the Mount Holyoke College-to-Amherst run and said he likes the route because on weekend nights he gets propositioned by intoxicated Mt. Holyoke women returning to Holyoke from Amherst.

Busses are not the only vehicles dispatched out of the garage. Vans for transporting the disabled and the UMass field trip service are also run from the garage.

Kyle Bostain, a 21-year-old English major from Amherst, is a handi-van driver.

"I realize that I'm helping people," he said. "It makes me feel good."

As could be expected, safety is important to Barrett. It is "always a concern but not a problem," he said.

The busses are designed to carry two-times the number of seated and standing passengers, he said.

"Unless everyone on the bus weighs over 250-pounds, there's no way to exceed the weight capacity" of the bus, Barrett said.

Operations Manager Allan Byam said there has never been a serious injury or fatality connected to the UMass bus system.

"The MBTA (Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority) has more accidents in one day than we have in a year," Byam said.

Before a shift begins, every driver must do a "circle check" of the bus. This includes checking air pressure, wheel lug nuts, fire equipment and lights.

Every bus is equipped with a two-way radio for communication with the controller's station at the garage.

As an added safety feature, all the busses have a microprocessor that continually monitors air pressure in the brake lines and engine fluid levels. If a problem arises the processor sends a signal to the controller who then contacts the driver before the situation becomes critical.

Listen to the deaf's problems

Tomorrow marks the end of National Deaf Awareness Week, which has given many people an opportunity to discuss issues and provide facts about deafness.

There are more than 16 million deaf or hard-of-hearing people in the US. Some people are born deaf; others lose their hearing late in life. Still others are partially deaf or hard-of hearing.

There are many types of hearing loss. An individual's hearing ability may fluctuate, depending on their immediate environment, health, or just the type of day one might have. Depending on the individual, a hearing-impaired person may or may not use their voice. Language may vary. Not all deaf people sign; American Sign Language (ASL) is the native language of many deaf people, and is the third most used language in the United States.

Marjie Stout

It is difficult to be hearing-impaired, often due to lack of aids or equipment in the hearing world. When a hearing-impaired person needs to use the phone without an interpreter, he or she can only do so with a special device called a TTY or TDD. A TTY/TDD has to be used by both parties for communication to take place. This requires more time, as everything must be typed back and forth instead of spoken.

Deafness also takes up a lot of extra time in other areas of life. In school, extra research for information is often necessary, which includes note copying, tutoring and time spent for other support services. UMass Deaf Services at Handicapped Student Affairs provides deaf students with interpreters, notetakers, and tutors. While services there are excellent, deaf students (and employees) on campus are still in further need of equal access, such as having TTYs in every office on campus so that they can telephone departments themselves.

There is also a shortage of interpreters. More funding and support from the University is needed in order to recruit and retain qualified, professional interpreters.

Hearing loss and the subsequent communication barrier contributes to isolation from others. People who lose their hearing much later in life are especially prone to isolation from the hearing and deaf world. For the elderly, hearing loss is not a part of their life's agenda, and they may be unprepared to deal with it. Most often a hearing loss goes undetected with a slow decline, and denial comes easily.

When I received my first pair of hearing aids at age 18, I was astonished, not to mention overwhelmed, at the difference in volume. However, not all people can benefit from using hearing aids. There may be complications and adjustments to deal with. Hearing aids are not at all like glasses in the sense that they automatically correct the impairment. While they amplify sound, they do not clarify.

Since I began to use interpreters a year and a half ago, I've become more involved with the deaf community, and I've just begun to understand the advantages and disadvantages of being hearing-impaired. Many people, including my friends and relatives, are not always sure of how to include me in conversations, but that situation tends to improve as I learn to assert my own needs.

Most people who are hearing can't realize what hearing-impaired people are up against, when there are so many things to hear and take for granted. Just imagine yourself not being able to hear the phone ring, or not being able to answer it or make a call, hear the news on the radio or TV, your professor, or an announcement meant for everybody but yourself.

There are plenty of opportunities to learn more about deafness. Make it your business to find out more. Also, don't be hesitant to communicate with deaf or hard-of-hearing people. If you don't know sign, then there are other ways to communicate. Speak clearly and with normal pronunciation; a note pad never hurts. The important thing is that you are making the effort.

Some advice for Mike and George

2+2 equals. . .3? 4? 5?

Tom, Dick and Harry sat around a coffee table, watching the Patriots get hammered, and discussing economics.

Tom, an ardent conservative, argued the economy's better now than in 1980, since he has a good job and can pay for his oldest daughter's college education.

"Look at the unemployment rate," he said. "In '80, with Carter, we had 7.0 percent unemployment. Now it's about 5.5 percent. And my daughter can pay for part of her education," he added, citing a drop in unemployment since 1980 among females aged 16-19 from 17.2 to 15.9 percent.

"You can't argue with that," he said as he gulped his Coors.

Harry, an equally fervent liberal, is appalled.

"Tom, I can't believe you're happy with Reaganomics," he said. "Sure, your kid can pay for college, but how will she pay for that $2 trillion debt we're sitting on?"

Still flabbergasted, Harry began quoting statistics as if he were reading a condemnation of the Gipper.

"The Gross National Product is down under Reagan. It was 3.1 percent under Carter – it's 2.75 now. If you make more now than in '80, it's because of inflation. The median income for a family is just barely up from 1980, and that's because more family members work now."

Dick was confused.

How could two completely different stories be correct?

While economists, presidential candidates and others sort out the why's of our economy, it's necessary to place our economic woes, real or otherwise, into a historical perspective.

If US economic growth was steep in the years immediately following World War II, doesn't it make sense for there to be a period of 'slowed' growth afterward? Is it unreasonable to assume a rate of incredible growth can't continue forever?

Yes, things aren't moving along as rapidly as in the 1950s, but such a slowdown in growth is to be expected.

The unemployment rate, for obvious reasons, drops during war years. Unemployment in the Post-Vietnam War period (starting in 1976) has wavered between 5.5 percent (est. 1988) and 9 percent. But except for the period's recession (1981-1983), unemployment has been between 5.5 and 7.7 percent. Furthermore, in the years before Vietnam but after the Korean War – a time of economic boom – unemployment wavered between 4.1 percent and 6.8 percent.

The one percent change shows a slowdown in growth, yes, but the difference between the types of peacetime unemployment figures now are comparable to the 1950s.

Then there's GNP growth, which has drifted downward since the 1960s. While it was in the neighborhood of four percent in the 1950s, in 1987 it stood at under three percent.

David R. Mark

Again, the point to remember is we have not see a contraction in growth but a slowdown in growth. And a slowdown in growth in the last 20 years, while not as good as the economic boom of the 1950s, is still better than a economic contraction.

As for the question "Why is there a slowdown in economic growth?" The answer may lie in a slowdown in job-producing technological innovations, like television, the space industry, and construction. After job booms in these industries in the 1950s, where can one go but to a slowed growth?

The factors, however, that's contributed most to slowed growth in the 1980s are our incredible federal and trade deficits.

We are a debtor_nation because of Reaganomics, which is why slowed growth may eventually lead to economic collapse. With the deficit now at more than $2 trillion, the question arises: "How will we survive?"

It's a terrifying question.

The US would not have has this kind of economic slowdown if it didn't have to pay the interest on our enormous deficits. The money, if we had it, could have been reinvested into the economy, spurring more growth.

As for the trade deficit: Again, moving from a slight surplus or deficit (until the mid-80s) is a far cry from the $714 billion deficit we've racked up from 1982-87. The trade deficit, at the very least, strains our economic growth.

Have the 1980s been economically sound as advocated by our fictional Tom and the not-so-fictional Republican nominee, George Bush? Or is it bad, as advocated by our fictional Harry and the not-so-fictional Democratic nominee, Michael Dukakis?

The answer is difficult. We're in slowed economic growth. That's good, but not great. It could be better.

If you're making good money, you'll probably agree with Bush. If you aren't, you'll probably support Dukakis. It's up to you to decide where you stand economically, but I for one am left in the same position as the fictional Dick.

Confused.

Amherst priority and un-Smith parties

Winner of the 1988 Five College Prize for Unnecessary Information: The Robert Frost Library at Amherst College. This fine library greets earnest scholars with a sign stating Amherst College students will be given priority if the library gets full. In other words, "if the going gets tough, we will boot you."

That's understandable. Amherst College students pay a lot of money to go to the college, maintain the physical plant, and pay for the resources in the library. They probably should get priority. But do they have to put up a sign telling you before you even get into the library that you are considered a second-class citizen?

How about this: a sign at the entrance to the Tower Library, reading, "If the elevators are full, University of Massachusetts students will be given priority. Amherst College students especially have to walk to the twenty-sixth floor."

Last year, the Board of Governors ran into some trouble when the Republican Club and the Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay Alliance were in adjacent offices. Two organizations with diametrically opposed views obviously couldn't get along. The Republican Club's office space is still in jeopardy (although they get around it with Students for Bush and the Minuteman). The Distinguished Visitors Program, in an adjoining office, also had problems with the Republicans.

Nancy Klingener

So now, the decision is to stick Spectrum, an arts magazine, into the same space as Students for Bush. Good idea. They sure will be having some good times around that office. Maybe I'm wrong. Maybe they can learn and exchange ideas. Maybe Spectrum will start printing homages to William F. Buckley, or the Minuteman will come out with poems protesting U.S. support of El Salvador.

And another thing – why is Minuteman "acting editor in chief" Bill Collins still on campus, in the Student Union, in the Collegian? This guy has been at UMass longer than some tenured professors. He probably was at the ground-breaking for the Morrill Science Center. I definitely saw him in a cap and gown last May. Isn't there a statute of limitations for the undergraduate mentality?

Something has to be done about the Greek system. No, they're not hazing. They're plagiarizing, and from the worst of sources.

The most recent sorority rush slogan was "The Choice of a New Generation." Sound familiar? How about "Membership Has Its Priviledges" (sic)? This beauty popped up in a poster in the Student Union, urging students to rush a fraternity.

Let's name names here. These slogans are corporate advertising messages, specifically for Pepsi and American Express. What are the Greeks trying to say? If they really want to be the leaders of tomorrow, and I'm not questioning that, they could start with a simple original rush slogan. It can't be that hard.

Smith College had a good idea last weekend: the un-Smith party. You couldn't get in if you were wearing pearls or a skirt. These parties could be fun. At UMass, you couldn't wear sweats of any kind, or untied high-tops. At Hampshire, no one wearing black clothing could get in.

I can hear the cries now, "you're stereotyping our schools." Right. But Smith has the right idea here. The best way to deal with stereotypes is to mock them, and show how ridiculous they really are. Plus it probably makes a good party.

'Ringers' stays true to Cron's style

By JIM COLE
Collegian Staff

David Cronenberg is truly an anomaly. This mild-mannered- looking gentleman with square glasses and a quiet personality is responsible for some of the most grotesque and unnerving films ever, including They came from Within, about people infected by a sexually transmitted parasite, and The Brood, in which a mother gives birth to blood-soaked mutant babies.

Lately, Cronenberg has moved towards the mainstream with The Fly, a masterpiece, though still graphic. But now comes Dead Ringers, the story of twin gynecologists and their descent into drug use and madness. Finally, a Cronenberg film without gore, without horror? Nope.

Though there is almost no bloodletting in the film, the story and characters are as disturbing as ever. Jeremy Irons plays both Elliott and Beverly Mantle, twin geniuses with a nonexistent personal life. That is, until Claire Niveau (Genevieve Bujold) enters the picture. Unable to bear children, she comes to Elliott for help, and subsequently takes him to bed. The problem is that half the time, she's taking Beverly to bed as well, as these brothers believe in sharing. When she finds out, she dumps them both. End of conflict. Except that Beverly, the more "sensitive" and unstable one, has fallen in love and can't live without her.

From that point on, disturbing is the best description of the events. Cronenberg uses the trap of one brother following in the footsteps of the other, and though Elliott tries to shape Beverly up, it's not long before he's popping pills himself. The ending isn't hard to guess, and it sure isn't happy. I walked out of the theater numbed, both enthralled by Irons' performances (within ten minutes I could distinguish the twins. So brilliant was his acting that he deserves two Oscars), but shaken by the film itself. It is so dark, so downbeat, that I really wished for a dose of Peter Sellers afterwards. Couldn't anyone have laughed in this film, just a bit?

In retrospect, Dead Ringers proved that Cronenberg can horrify without grossing-out. It's his most mature work, but still not his best.

Smith and Southwest open art shows

By KATHERINE T. LAMOTHE
Collegian Staff

Hello, folks, welcome to another edition of Art Attack. I've been trying to put together a list of area art galleries for you, as I've been promising you since Week 1. I was to have put this list in two parts for you: this week was to have been the galleries on campus, and next week was to be the galleries in the other four colleges in the Five Colleges as well as Northampton. But I didn't get enough response from the campus galleries (to those that did respond, I thank you very much), so I'll have a big list of galleries in next week's column.

While we're on the subject of gallery info, if anyone from the local galleries is reading, please send your information on shows to the Collegian by Wednesday of the week you want the show mentioned in the column. That way, I can write it up and have it in the office by my deadline. Let's get on to the galleries.

Hampden Gallery in Southwest Residential Area is featuring a new paint and sculpture show in conjunction with Northampton's Center for the Arts. The exhibit, titled Art in the Dark: Luminous Painting and Sculpture in the 1980's, is being held concurrently at both galleries from Oct. 4-Nov.6 with two opening receptions: Tuesday, Oct.4 from 5-8 p.m. at The Center for the Arts, and Thursday, Oct. 6 from 5-8 p.m. at Hampden Gallery. This isn't just an exhibit with fluorescent paint. It uses other means of luminosity, such as fiber optics and intense colors. Point of interest for those who like the New Wave group Devo: Mark Mothersbaugh will have works featured in this show, along with other artists such as Joe Davis and Marc Egger. Hampden Gallery's hours are Monday, through Friday, 3-7 p.m. and Sunday, 2-5 p.m. The Center's hours are Tuesday-Friday, 10 a.m.-5 p.m., Saturday -Sunday, 12-5 p.m.

Meanwhile, at Smith College . . . Pennsylvania artist Martha Armstrong will be showing her paintings and drawings at Hillyer Corridor Gallery through Oct. 14. The works are interesting in that they are landscapes with an abstract structure. The Gallery's hours are Monday through Friday, 9 to 5 p.m. and weekends, noon to 5 p.m.

APE Ltd. is presenting two photography shows from Oct.8 through 31, with both shows holding opening receptions on Oct. 8 from 3 to 6 p.m. The first, titled African Roots, features work by French-American photographer Dian Mandle. The photographs were taken in Kenya, Zimbabwe and Senegal and reflect the beauty of Africa as well as the need to maintain the unique cultures in these nations in particular. Finally, Joseph Todaro is showing Storia Immigrante (Immigrant Story), a look at the brutal life of immigrants, often using old family snapshots which Todaro rephotographed. The galleries' hours are Monday, through Saturday, 9:30 - 5:30, Thursday nights until 9:30 p.m., and Sundays, noon until 5 p.m.

Well, that's all for this week. Next week, the list. I promise.

■ Dead Ringers

Soon: Murder One, an obcsure fact-based little film about an ex-con who takes his kid brother (Henry Thomas of "E.T") on a killing spree across the midwest. It's only playing in a few houses in New York. Could be interesting. The Wizard of Loneliness is a nostalgic story of a spoiled city boy (Lucas Haas of "Witness") adjusting to life in Vermont in 1944. Well recieved, it's already gone from New York and is in a couple theaters in Boston. If you want to see it, don't stay around here.

Fear not. Help is on the way, in the form of a wacky new comedy opening at the Hampshire 6 today. Heartbreak Hotel, set in 1972, is the story of a kid who solves the family problems by kidnapping Elvis Presley. Written and directed by Chris Columbus (Gremlins, Adventures in Babysitting), it sounds promising. The ad claims, "our lives were never the same." I don't doubt it.

Coming soon, the cream of the fall film flicks: Punchline, Gorillas in the Mist, and Alien Nation. Stay tuned.

Folkies Klezamir play at Grace Episcopal Church Sunday at 1 p.m. $5 cover includes brunch. Call 586-5282.

Missing Cat plays The Hatch tonight.

Cat in the Hatch

Brookline-based Missing Cat may be the best thing to happen to Michael Dukakis since the appointment of Dan Quayle.

"He's our neighbor, we know him, he's our friend," said Ari Vais, one half of the acoustic act that plays the Hatch tonight. "He wrote our next single."

"Actually Kitty wrote that one," fellow Cat Jonah Matranga said of the duo's upcoming single "Kimo Ki Papa Tai" due out in 1989.

Well, whoever's responsible for the song with the Swahili title meaning "you've got big tits," Dukakis gets the credit.

"We figure we're going to humanize Michael Dukakis by giving him statements in Swahili," Matranga said.

See what else the band who claims influences as REM, Simon and Garfunkel and the Beatles can do tonight at 9 p.m. at the Hatch.

"The option play comes down to execution," Reid said. "And we've worked hard on it and gained some confidence. The receivers are blocking well downfield. [Offensive coordinator] Bob McConnell is teaching it well."

But the running game doesn't end on the option play. Fullback David Mitchell has become a workhorse, and gained 112 yards against Harvard. He has yet to lose yardage on a carry this season.

"David had just as good a preseason last year as he did this year, but then he pulled a thigh muscle at the beginning of last season," Reid said.

"He's very consistent and now we have some stability at fullback with him and [sophomore] Jim Pastorick."

Junior split end Chip Mitchell has been a valuable weapon, both as a receiver (15 catches for 293 yards) and as a kickoff return man (6 for 137 yards). His only run of the season went for a 30-yard gain.

And then there is Palazzi, who is 39 of 73 for 630 yards, 7 touchdowns and 2 interceptions.

"We have too much offense right now," Reid said. "We have to pick a part to emphasize each week."

The Terrier offense, led by senior quarterback Jeff Schuman (71-of-120 for 681 yards, 6 touchdowns and 4 interceptions), isn't bad either.

"BU has a run-and-shoot offense and some good receivers," Reid said. "On defense, they are aggressive hard hitters, and they seem cohesive. It'll be a stiff test. There's nothing they'd like better than to come in here and kick our butts off and they're capable of doing it."

But the BU offense wasn't quite good enough last week. The Villanova defense stopped BU fullback Jay Hillman on a 4th-and-1 in overtime to come away with a 31-24 victory.

It was exactly the type of stand the defense will need to make tomorrow if good things are to continue for UMass football.

Women's soccer

"They are an opportunistic team, rather than a creative team," Rudy said. "They've lost some good games to some good teams. They're mobile and they like to counter-attack."

Holy Cross features a pair of fleet forwards in Libby Calvecchio and Melissa Hendrickson, whom Rudy calls a very fast, counter-attack oriented player. Paula Russo, a tough and quick midfielder, should also make her presence felt.

The one thing that could give UMass problems is the field, which at 110 yards by 65 yards is the minimum size for soccer. Also, the fake stuff on the field is imbedded with rocks, taking away the bounce and making it tough on the body.

"We're going to have to bring a big jar of Vaseline to take care of the rug burns," Rudy said.

Sidelines: Rudy doesn't have much to say about his team's drop to fifth in the national rankings, behind the University of Connecticut. "I don't really care about polls. There are a lot of false rankings in them," Rudy said. "A coach will vote a team higher so that when his team plays that team, it makes his team look better. I should know. I used to do it myself."

us at the end of the year," said Gettler. "It's a real big game."

"They're pretty quick," Gettler said of the young Mountaineer squad. "Though its always different when people come here to Boyden and play on our long grass."

Siena will bring a 1-5 record into the tournament; their lone win of the season was a 4-0 trouncing of Utica College.

"They've played only teams that were regionally or nationally ranked," explained UMass assistant coach John Martin of Sunday's opponent. "They're aggressive and they'll go for 90 minutes."

The Minutemen will be without forward Steve Cesnek, who will be out of town to attend a wedding. Gettler will leave Cesnek's position unfilled, opting for a 4-4-2 lineup instead.

Free kicks: UMass alums Andy Bing, Kevin Flynn and Mike Gibbons, all of whom have played professional soccer since leaving UMass, will participate in Saturday's Alumni game. . .The Minutemen and 250 of their closest friends will fill the Campus Center Center Auditorium for the annual "Challenge Cup Banquet" tomorrow evening.

Farley led the A-10s in hitting efficiency and was a first team all-conference player last year.

Ford said that although Farley is a great player, the Minutewomen know her tendencies and are ready to slow her down.

"We want to put up a double block on her. She hits just a few feet away from the set, we also have to be ready for the tip," Ford said. "We'll just make the adjustments as we need to."

"Player-for-player we match up very well" with George Washington, Ford said, while also adding that she has confidence in the bench, if she needs to go to it.

UMass has momentum on its side and, more appropriately, GW and Farley should get ready for the Minutewomen.

"I'm real happy with where we are. We won't be doing too much differently," Ford said.

With their winning ways, UMass just tuned up for tonight's match by working on serving and passing this week, Ford said.

"(On Wednesday) we worked on aggressive serves — high and deep, and high, deep floaters which we practiced on purpose," because it slows down a face-paced offense, Ford said.

UMass to battle top-ranked Old Dominion

Undefeated teams to play this afternoon

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

A golden opportunity has presented itself to the University of Massachusetts field hockey team.

Today the Minutewomen will play the NCAA's top-ranked team, Old Dominion University, at Totman Field. Gametime is set for 3 p.m. UMass will then travel to the University of Maine on Sunday.

"We're both undefeated," UMass coach Pam Hixon said. "I think that if we had a win against Old Dominion and then we finished out the week with a win against Maine, then I think we'll get the No. 1 ranking."

Old Dominion is 8-0. UMass is 7-0 and ranked No. 4 in the nation. The stage is set for a classic confrontation.

"A win for us would be a tremendous confidence builder. That's for sure," Hixon said. "It would put us right up there, being one of the all-time great victories that we've had on this campus."

Last weekend, Old Dominion beat the University of North Carolina, which had held the No. 1 ranking the previous week, 4-0. In its opening game ODU slipped by last year's national champion, the University of Maryland, 4-3.

The Lady Monarchs are led by senior co-captain Jill Fisher. Fisher has already scored 17 goals and handed out five assists. She is third on Old Dominion's all-time leading goal scorers list with 52.

Old Dominion has also received a good part of its offense from a freshman, Maaika Hilbrand. Hilbrand is the Lady Monarchs' second leading scorer with nine goals and two assists.

The Minutewomen are going to have to keep the Lady Monarchs out of the circle. ODU possesses a very potent penalty corner combination.

"They have an excellent corner combination that they use consistently on turf," Hixon said. "The bulk of their scoring is done on penalty corners from what I understand."

Up to this point, the Minutewomen have not committed many fouls to give up penalty corners. And when they have, they certainly have been able to ward off any play that the opposition has thrown at them. UMass has only given up one goal in seven games.

UMass' senior goaltender Cindy Cox has played every minute of the seven games with the exception of the second half of the game with Yale University on Tuesday which the Minutewomen won 3-0. Her goal against average stands at 0.14 and she has not allowed a goal in her last six games.

Cox's counterpart for this game will be sophomore Kathy Sosina. Sosina has shut out five teams this season and has given up five goals.

UMass might gain a little more recognition by winning today's game, but there are still 11 games to go before the Atlantic 10 Championships in November.

"I don't think one game tells you how good any team is. I think consistency over time is what really tells you how good a team is. For us, it's the next game and we're going to take on the challenge of playing the No. 1 team in the country."

A loss in this game would not be catastrophic. In fact, the worst that the Minutewomen can really do in this game is join the rest of ODU's competition.

"Winning or tying this game can only help us," Hixon said. "In terms of where we are right now in New England and in the country, because Old Dominion is undefeated, a loss just puts in a category with every one else. It certainly doesn't diminish what we've done before this week."

The Minutewomen beat the Lady Monarchs two years ago at Totman. They will be hoping for similar results today as they attempt to remain unbeaten.

SPORTS

Minutemen to host Terriers

By MATT GERKE
Collegian Staff

Things are going pretty well for the University of Massachusetts football team: its quarterback has established himself as a leader, the offense has been powerful, and the team has scored 45 points on two occasions while jumping out to a 2-1 record.

Imagine what the Minutemen could do if their defense was up to par.

"How many teams do you know of that are 2-1 and have allowed as many yards as us [1689]?" UMass head coach Jim Reid said.

The answer can probably be counted on one finger. Yet UMass does have a winning record and has some solid momentum going into tomorrow's 1:30 p.m. game against Boston University at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

More importantly, Reid feels the defense is getting better.

"We determined that the down linemen had to be more active, come off blocks and move their feet," Reid said. "I saw that happen against Harvard and I saw improvement as the game went on. And don't forget, we couldn't have won the Maine game without the defense."

Pat Doran intercepted Maine quarterback Mike Buck late in the first game of the season to seal a 45-42 win for the Minutemen.

Since then, UMass lost to Ball State 44-17 and beat Harvard 45-28. It returns to the Yankee Conference schedule this week against the Terriers (1-2, 1-1 in the Yankee Conference).

"We're just hoping to have everyone healthy," Reid said. "We came out of the Harvard game unscratched but the flu has caught us big time. The doctor told several players they should take a day off and try to recover. But every player except one was in uniform that day ready to practice. That's the attitude of this team."

That attitude is what has allowed the Minutemen to be successful so far. That — and the offense.

Senior quarterback Dave Palazzi has been solid this year, and the option has become the bread-and-butter play for UMass.

"It's just a matter of emphasis," Reid said. "If you want to do well in geology, you will if you emphasize it. I wanted us to be an option team because it puts a lot of pressure on the defense and opens up the passing game."

On the play, Palazzi runs laterally with the ball and either keeps it or pitches out at the last second, usually to tailback Kevin Smellie.

UMass set to play host for tourney

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Correspondent

You won't find any yellow ribbons decorating trees on campus, or throngs of friends and relatives gathered around the team bus. But there are plenty of people associated with the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team who are awful glad to see the squad return home for two games this weekend.

Since coach Jeff Gettler's squad last clawed the turf of Upper Boyden field in a 4-0 win over St. Joe's on September 18, the Minutemen have dropped three consecutive games to Dartmouth, Vermont and Yale. For a squad that's just had an unusually tough week at the office, this weekend's sixth annual UMass Challenge Cup should provide a much needed boost.

"Our tournament is a big pump for us," said Gettler, "We want to do well. . .psychologically there is a lot of incentive there."

"It's the biggest thing we do here," continued Gettler, "it's really our big affair."

Squads from Boston University (the No.18 ranked team in the nation) and Siena, as well as Atlantic 10 rival West Virginia University are in town for the tournament, which will also include a UMass soccer alumni game scheduled for Saturday at noon.

The Minutemen will play West Virginia tomorrow at 3pm, and face Siena at the same time on Sunday.

In their pursuit of an invitation to the NCAA post season tournament, the Minutemen must now make a dent in the Atlantic 10 conference. Though West Virginia (2-5-1) plays in the league's West division, and UMass competes in the East, any win within the conference will help to impress the NCAA.

"Any time we beat an Atlantic 10 team, even though they're in the other division, it' s going to bode well for

UMass to clash with Rutgers, Holy Cross

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team passed the first part of its crucial late-week by beating Brown University Wednesday night.

Now the Minutewomen step right out of the kettle and into the fire, traveling to New Brunswick, N.J. to face Rutgers University tonight at 7 p.m.

UMass will then face Holy Cross Sunday afternoon in Worcester, the final game in a stretch of four straight on the road.

Tonight will be the second time that the Minutewomen face the Lady Knights this season. They opened their season against Rutgers at the Rhode Island Tournament, picking up a 2-0 win. But UMass coach Jim Rudy isn't terribly excited to face the 1-3-1 Knights again.

"I really don't like playing a team twice in the regular season, because the (NCAA Tournament) committee will only count one," Rudy said. "If we win one and tie one, it really doesn't say much, and if we win one and lose one, it doesn't say anything."

Also, this may be the "season" game for the Knights, who have found themselves in a terrible rut of late and will be needing a quick fix. Rutgers, with very few "big games" left on its schedule, will almost certainly need a win in this game to keep any post-season hopes intact.

Rutgers has gone six days without playing, and catches the Minutewomen at a bad time, when they are in the midst of a packed schedule.

"They are well-rested. This win could put them right back in it," Rudy said.

This will also be the second consecutive night game for the Minutewomen, but this one will be on turf. Sunday's game will also be played on that AstroConcrete stuff.

The Crusaders of Holy Cross are on a roller coaster this year, running up a 2-6 record but losing to five teams that are ranked in the national Top 20 in their respective divisions, including Hartford, Harvard, Boston College, Rochester and Keene State.

Minutewomen open A-10 schedule against GWU

By RONN GARRY
Collegian Staff

Tonight's match at George Washington University presents a multitude of opportunities for the University of Massachusetts volleyball team.

First, a win will give the Minutewomen a 10-0 record — finishing the month of September undefeated. Second, it is the start of "the second-season," the Atlantic 10 schedule, in which UMass will play the next three A-10 matches on the road. And, third, UMass can prove last year's victory over the Lady Colonials in the A-10 tourney was no fluke.

Hypothetical situations aside, the game must be attended to first.

"This team (UMass) doesn't need any extra motivation to play GW. There's kind of a rivalry between the two teams," UMass coach Carol Ford said.

This will also be the first conference match for George Washington which enters the game with 9-7 record. But, the Colonials return their premier outside hitter — senior Cheryl Farley.

Water polo at Eastern tourney

If last their sweep of three games the weekend before last showed how far the University of Massachusetts water polo team has come, then last weekend showed just how far they have to go.

The team dropped four games, leaving its record at 3-4 heading into this weekend's Eastern Varsity Tournament at Brown. Despite the drubbings, the team came out of the three-day set somewhat optimistically.

"I was very pleased with our progress," UMass coach Russ Yarworth said.

The Minutemen will look to continue that progress this weekend. They start off at noon tomorrow against Brown and, depending on the outcome, will battle some of the tough eastern competitors, looking to set themselves up for a high New England ranking and earn a berth in the Easterns.

In other sports action, the UMass women's tennis team will be at the New England Tournament at the University of Vermont.

Petition of sub-station removal considered

By THOMAS RODRIGUES
Collegian Staff

A petition asking the police sub-station established Saturday in Washington Tower to be moved out of the dormitory has been considered and put on a back burner.

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis Madson, Executive Director of Public Safety Arthur Hilson, and Student Government Association co-Presidents-elect Shari Silkoff and Jason Rabinowitz all received copies of the petition Wednesday, endorsed with 200 signatures.

The campus officials and student leaders agreed the sub-station, likely to receive a new name to allay bad connotations, should be given a fair trial and will remain in Washington Tower as planned.

The petition, started Sept. 22 by Jeff Filipov, a 23-year-old student living on the 14th floor of Washington, was originally reported to have 500 signatures but Hilson disputed that fact, saying there are about 200. The Collegian has yet to obtain a copy of the signed petition.

The sub-station, a prototype of future stations, is part of a large-scale operation called the PEACE program, which was mounted by Hilson last semester to combat the crime rate and better police/student relations on campus.

"We've given it (the petition) some serious thought, but the problem is one of available space. We take what we can get," Hilson said.

One location originally discussed for the sub-station was Hampden Dining Commons in the Southwest Residential Area, but because most of the space in Hampden is currently being used the idea was not feasible, Hilson said.

The petition makes the point that students were not consulted about the location of the sub-station and voices the fear that other stations will crop up in other "strategic locations."

"We're not considering moving it; we're going to give it a good honest try," Madson said. "In our society a lot of people are intimidated by the police, this sub-station is trying to relieve some of the intimidation," he said.

But students in Washington and all over Southwest say they can not help but feel the station is the beginning of a police state or something along those lines.

According to Hilson, the three officers who will man the sub-station along with student security staff, will not be looking for problems or even responding to an incident occurring in Southwest.

The objective of the sub-station is to establish a personal tie with the students, to overcome apprehension involved in reporting crime, and to create a more positive image of Public Safety officers, according to the initial draft of the plan.

Another student concern is the sub-station's secondary unit, housed on the fifth floor of the tower, which will be the locale for crime prevention workshops, and conferences with student security and residential staff.

Students say they are troubled at the thought of having the police roaming the building.

"It's getting to be quite a nuisance actually," said a seventh-floor Washington resident. The resident, who did not want to be identified, said his friends had been kicked out of the elevator when officers commandeered it for "police business."

Band leader loses bet, swims pond

By PATRICIA REGO
Collegian Correspondent

More than 300 students gathered Friday evening at the Campus Pond to watch the leader of the band march into the water for losing a bet.

George Parks, director of the University of Massachusetts marching band, lived up to his promise to swim the pond, known for its vile bathing conditions, if the band sold at least $20,000 in magazine subscriptions by Sept. 15.

The band raised $20,600 in magazine sales, topping last year's total of about $14,000. The money will go in part toward an upcoming trip to Delaware.

Jocelyn Fein, fund-raising coordinator and senior member of the band, said Parks agreed to the bet over a long-distance phone call during the summer. She said Parks was "not worried" because he did not anticipate the band would reach the $20,000 figure.

Clad in a bathrobe, straw hat, and holding a rubber ducky, Parks played up his promise to immerse himself in the murky water. He relaxed in his lounge chair sipping a soda, waiting for the right moment.

Then he made his move, walking through the crowd — which by then had grown to about 350 — and throwing in his ducky first.

"What are you doing, testing for sharks?," asked one band member, as others began to chant, "March, march."

Parks psyched out the group by taking his bathrobe off, leaving him in a blue wet suit under his jams and red suspenders. The crowd, lining both sides of the pond, began to shout, "Throw him in, throw him in." As a cannon went off, sending the ducks flying, Parks entered the water.

Two band members played the theme to "Jaws" on their tubas as the director did the backstroke across the pond.

The onlookers cheered and yelled "Under," to which Parks shook his head, responding, "not under, have you seen this water?"

Fein said the band pulled together in the final week to beat the $20,000 mark.

"A week before the deadline we hadn't made it yet," Fein said. "[Parks] thought he was home free. But everyone in the band really worked hard to get the sales that last week."

Women's soccer remains unbeaten with a pair of wins

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

Some things are just so reliable that one could wager his house on it and still feel safe.

Here at the University of Massachusetts, even more dependable than the Campus Mall and marches on Whitmore is the women's soccer team. Through rain, sleet, snow, grueling road trips and playing on AstroTurf, the Minutewomen remain unbeaten, thanks to a pair of victories this past weekend.

UMass traveled to New Brunswick, N.J. Friday night and came away with a tough 2-1 overtime win over Rutgers University, and then followed that yesterday with a 1-0 win over Holy Cross in Worcester.

Despite facing a challenging schedule that has them playing four games in seven days, the Minutewomen have an impressive 7-0 record, good enough to be ranked fifth in the nation.

But it hasn't been easy.

"We're exhausted right now," UMass coach Jim Rudy said after yesterday's win. "But I'm really pleased. This is a great bunch of people and they hang in there. They never give up."

Nonetheless, this is a weary group, and it had its effects this past weekend.

"They (Holy Cross) played us even-Steven for the first half," Rudy said. "The field was small and they outhustled us. It put a lot of pressure on. We had to make extra touches because of the fatigue."

Fortunately, the Minutewomen have a relatively deep bench, which Rudy turned to for help.

"We subbed more in this game than we had in the past six," Rudy said. "But the subs made a big difference. Robin Runstein did a good job in the midfield, and Tracy Arwood and Kim Montgomery really hustled up front."

Shuttle crew delivers eulogy

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. (AP) — Discovery's astronauts delivered a poignant salute yesterday to their fallen Challenger comrades, eulogizing them as fellow sojourners and friends, and saying "At this moment, our place in the heavens makes us feel closer to them than ever before."

Said astronaut John M. Lounge: "It's good to be back to where they wanted to go so badly."

As they beamed down spectacular views of the mottled blue and white Earth miles below, the Discovery astronauts spoke about the Challenger, America's last manned space venture, which exploded on liftoff 32 months ago, tragically killing school teacher Christa McAuliffe and six others.

"Those on the Challenger who had flown before and seen these sights, they would know why we set forth."

Discovery is to return home from its four-day, one-hour, 65-orbit flight Monday, landing at Edwards Air Force Base in California at 12:37 p.m. EDT.

Gathered in the Discovery's middeck in front of a photograph of the Challenger crew, the crew took turns reading portions of the statement they had written.

"Today, up here where the blue sky turns to black," said commander Frederick H. Hauck, "we can say at long last to Dick, Mike, Judy, to Ron and El, and to Christa and Greg: 'Dear friends, we have resumed the journey that we promised to continue for you. Dear friends, your loss has meant that we could confidently begin anew. Dear friends, your spirit and your dreams are still alive in our heart.' "

The seven who died aboard Challenger were Richard Scobee, Michael Smith, Judith Resnik, Ronald McNair, Ellison Onizuka, Christa McAuliffe and Gregory Jarvis.

In a 20-minute news conference with reporters gathered in a Mission Control auditorium, Hauck praised Discovery's performance, saying "I'm not sure that we've had a mission that has been this trouble-free with an orbiter before."

Primary hopeful loses by his own vote

NEWTON (AP) — Democratic hopeful Herbert Connolly lost the state primary election for a seat on the Massachusetts Governor's Council by just one vote: his own.

The 67-year-old car dealer said he failed to cast a ballot because he got to the polls just minutes after they closed at 8 p.m. on Sept. 15.

"I was campaigning in Waltham, and I waited until the last minute to race over to vote," he said.

A recount last week showed Connolly with 14,715 votes. His opponent, a Lowell city councilor, got 14,716.

That result "gives new meaning to the phrase 'one-man, one-vote,' " conceded Connolly's attorney, William Galvin.

"It's very unfortunate," Galvin said. "I guess he could be a future poster boy for the state's get-out-and-vote campaign."

The eight-member Governor's Council, which dates from the colonial era, lost many of its powers in the 1960's. Its chief remaining duties are to approve criminal pardons and confirm judges nominated by Gov. Michael S. Dukakis.

Connolly, who has been a member of the council since 1969, is continuing to protest the election, claiming that some ballots are missing and others are invalid.

Galvin also suggested that the close vote might have has something to do with Connolly's opponent's last name: Kennedy.

"The first line on the ballot was for senator, and it said Edward M. Kennedy. The second line was for representative, and it said Joseph Kennedy. The next line was Governor's Council, and it said Robert Kennedy," Galvin said.

Boston prepares to fight rats

BOSTON (AP)— Fearing that thousands of rats may come scampering out of their burrows because of a downtown construction project, Boston is preparing a multi-million dollar eradication effort and has named a retired professor from Ohio to lead the city's anti-rat patrol.

Preliminary construction work started this summer for the $4.4 billion Central Artery project, which involves moving a highway underground to reduce congestion in the city's center.

Community groups have said the excavation could uproot huge colonies of rats, forcing them into adjacent areas of South Boston. To prevent such a chilling scenario, the city is planning a campaign involving public education, rat-proof trash cans, poison pellets and beefed-up sanitation measures.

William Jackson, a retired professor of biology at Bowling Green University in Ohio, has been chosen to head the campaign, The Boston Sunday Globe reported.

Jackson is a specialist in rodent control who previously has worked on rat problems in Africa, Southeast Asia and several US cities. He runs a private consulting firm named Biocenotics in Hillsdale, Mich.

"He's recognized as one of the experts in the country," said Terry Howard, Chicago's director of rodent control.

Boston is planning to begin its campaign with a public education and a sanitation crackdown to reduce garbage on city streets and starve the rats before any poison bait is introduced.

Smith rally protests violence to women

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — Acts of violence against women triggered a massive turnout of more than 1,500 students at Smith College last night, calling for safer streets and a means to "take back the night" for all women.

Holding candles and wearing armbands, the demonstrators marched around campus chanting "our bodies, our lives, our right to decide," and "women, united, will never be defeated."

Celeste Hart, head of residence for Hopkins House and rally coordinator, said the rally is a response to recent acts of violence on campus.

"Something drastic has happened on campus," Hart said, citing the rape of a student, as recently reported in the Smith College Sophian, a campus newspaper. "This is happening and we have to talk about it. We need not be silent and we will not be silent," she said.

"We are going to walk around campus symbolically lighting dark areas. This is our campus and tonight we are taking it back," Hart shouted to the cheering crowd.

Smith student Elizabeth Collins said "I was really bothered by [the rape]. Everyone on campus was notified — I cried all night thinking about what she's going through. I'm pretty cautious, but it made me that much more aware.

"We want to be able to walk alone, we want it to be safe. We have emergency boxes, but something is always able to happen," Collins said.

"I didn't go to the library the night I found out about the rape," said student Anne Burton. "I'm independent, but I still felt scared."

Smith students said security on campus should be improved and the campus shuttlebus organized by the Smith College Office for Student Affairs should become more visible.

"I think it's necessary to see the bus more, I never see it. If it ran longer hours, I would use it more," said sophomore Christine Miele.

"I rarely see it on campus," said first-year student Jen Kenisom.

Smith College Head of Security Sharon Rust said the shuttlebus runs from 9 p.m. to 1 a.m. "I've heard students feel it would be advantageous to have it running longer, but that's run through the Department of Student Affairs," she said.

Carol Weinberg, assistant dean of students at Smith said a copy of the bus route was delivered to all houses on campus and four open meetings will be held this week in each area of campus.

"We want to hear students' concerns and ideas. Security is a shared responsibility. We want to hear what people have to say," she said.

Officer Bev Derouin, a security officer at Smith since 1975, said the 2,400 to 2,600 resident campus is staffed by at least three foot patrolmen and one supervisor during the day. At night, two police cruisers, a supervisor and desk officer, and three to six foot patrolmen are on duty.

"I think this is reasonably adequate," Derouin said, adding that extra security is often held over on "party weekends."

Restaurants to donate money to Food Bank

By GEORGE FRANCY
Collegian Staff

An overwhelming response has greeted organizers of the Piece of the Pie program, an effort that will raise money to feed hungry people.

On Oct. 19, almost 60 restaurants in western Massachusetts and Connecticut will donate 10 percent of their gross receipts to The Western Massachusetts Food Bank as part of the program.

James Buehl, director of development for the food bank, said "The restaurant enlistment has been more successful than we ever imagined possible. He said the food bank was hoping for about 30 restaurants when they began asking people to participate. "At present we have 59 restaurants."

Buehl said publishers of the Advocate newspapers approached him with the idea for the program last spring. The Advocate had heard of a similar project in Maryland which has been successful for a number of years.

"It's taken an awful lot of staff time, Buehl said. "If it were one-shot thing it probably wouldn't be worth it. We all. . .have committed ourselves to doing this for several years."

Buehl estimated the effort will bring between $6,000 and $10,000 to the food bank. He said four other food banks in Connecticut were trying to enlist restaurants into the program.

The Pub in Amherst is one of the area restaurants that will participate. Said Jerry Joloy, manager of the Pub, "I thought about it and decided this might be a nice contribution for all of us to make."

Joloy said he had found out about the program through state Rep. Stan Rosenberg, D-Amherst, who wrote and then contacted Joloy by phone.

Rosenberg has been one of the major sponsors of the program. Two weeks ago he appeared before the University of Massachusetts Board of Governors to urge support from restaurants in the Campus Center and Student Union to participate. The BOG allocates space in the two buildings.

Bill Harris, director of the Campus Center, said it was unlikely the restaurants in the complex would participate.

"We operate at break-even," Harris said. "Any contribution we would make in receipts would mean we were operating at a loss."

Buehl explained why the event was being held on a Wednesday.

"We deliberately picked this for a Wednesday because Wednesday is traditionally the worst day in the restaurant business." He said the expectation is that more people will come out to eat on that day, which will improve the restaurant's business.

He said each restaurant will get posters and table tents to promote the event. "Now we are concentrating our effort on encouraging people to eat out on the 19th," Buehl said.

Foster system under investigation

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts state representatives are continuing their investigation of the state's foster care system and are working to improve the current process, Rep. Stan Rosenberg, D-Amherst, said.

In a public hearing in Northampton last week, four members of the House of Representatives foster care subcommittee heard testimony from foster parents, public and private administrators, and a former foster child in an effort to determine where improvements can be made, Rosenberg said.

"This is not a process of pointing fingers. We're here to insure that all children in Massachusetts have the best possible child care and live with dignity in our society," he said.

The series of investigations were triggered by the deaths of two Roxbury children within three to four months of each other, living in the same foster care home, Rosenberg said.

"It became clear that there were a whole series of regulations and laws that were being skirted or not obeyed," he said.

Rosenberg said the deaths are being investigated through a private inquest by the courts but "we felt we had to conduct some kind of investigation into the system."

Dr. Alexander Blount, a recognized expert in foster care, said the job of the Department of Social Services is "to assess risk and to find out whether abuse is occurring. Protection is the job — not to assess strength in the family."

To improve the system, Blount said he recommended "sending fewer kids into the system, making the connection between foster families and natural families, and limiting the number of kids a home can take."

Blount said the state should capitalize on the existing strengths in the system, citing the Massachusetts Appropriation to Partnerships in Parenting, a training program for foster parents.

Valerie Drollet, a foster parent for 23 years, said the MAPP program is one of the best in the country. "It's an excellent training program. It provides 10 sessions for prospective foster parents — it helps them prepare for the children," she said.

"Foster kids are much more disturbed than they used to be. They are often severely physically and emotionally abused, some sexually. MAPP prepares parents for their behavior and for unexpected problems," she said.

But, Drollet said, many current foster parents are not MAPP trained. "People can use extra training. We need to have training made available, both day and evening hours," she said.

Drollet also recommended ongoing training and yearly evaluations for current foster parents.

A major concern of foster parents is the amount of time it takes to get things done within the system and Drollet recommended giving social workers more authority to make decisions. "Part of it is that the supervisor is making many of the decisions. Decisions need to be made lower down on the scale.

"It's extremely frustrating, parents and children are left waiting for decisions. It would be very beneficial if the authority could be passed along with the responsibility," she said.

Another concern, Drollet said, is the unification of foster children with their biological parents. "The child should be at the biological parents' home if it is at all possible, but it should be a home which is safe and secure," she said.

"Often when a foster child goes home, the stresses are still there and things have not changed. Many children who go home end up coming back into the system," she said, recommending training for biological parents.

The foster care 24-hour hotline will help only "if you are assertive enough," and a foster care family court would be a good idea, Drollet said.

Former foster child and current Greenfield Community College student Pamela Chavis, 19, said her contact with DSS was inadequate, but her work with a private organization contracting with DSS, Tri-County Youth Program, "turned me in the right direction."

"DSS hasn't given me the attention that Tri-County has. They (DSS) were supposed to come see me every month, they never did. Tri-County was more of a one-on-one, they've shown me a whole different world," Chavis said.

Foster children should not be moved around as much as they are now, Chavis said. "I feel that if a child is moved around too much, there is too much confusion," she said.

The next public hearing for foster care will be held on Wednesday, Oct. 19, at Milford High School, at 7 p.m.

Charges against former budgets chair dropped

By YANA DLUGY
Collegian Staff

Hampshire District Court Thursday dismissed criminal charges against a former Student Government Association leader.

Nate Moore, SGA Budgets Committee ex-chairman, was charged with malicious destruction of property valued at more than $250. He pleaded innocent to the charge Tuesday.

University of Massachusetts Police filed criminal complaints against Moore last spring. The charges included slashing the tires of a car which belonged to former SGA Attorney General Bill Collins and vandilizing the motorcycle of former Thatcher Co-Senator Tom O'Connor.

Moore resigned as budgets committee chairman last spring after holding the position for more than two years, the longest budgets chair term in SGA history.

Moore claimed the reason for his resignation was continual harassment from Collins and O'Connor. "The stress and anxiety caused by this harassment affected my grades, my personal life, and also forced me to seek counseling. I can't allow it to destroy my life," Moore said last spring.

Moore said Collins also harassed other members of the budgets committee. He also said Collins would come into the budgets office and waste Moore's time arguing policies.

Collins, however, last semester refuted Moore's accusations. "No one was harassing Nate Moore. His resignation is not related to any actions by myself or Tom O'Connor. It is the result of his own actions."

After Moore's resignation, Gil Penchina filled the position of budgets committee chair. He resigned earlier in the semester after allegedly misusing student money during the summer. He claimed the misuse was part of a test to improve the way money is handled within the SGA.

The Undergraduate Student Senate Wednesday night approved Jessica Mitchell as the new budgets committee chair.

Odds and ends

Legal pipe dreams

A bright peaceful September morning. You are walking down Main Street in Amherst. Students flourish in masses to your left and right. Up ahead you spy a drug store, but wait . . . something here is odd. Approaching curiously you read the advertisements in the window.

"Columbian Gold Merits."

"New Port Skunk," $2.50/pck.

Richard Oliveira

Your eyes react accordingly. They refocus on the government warning below the price. "Don't just say no," "Tell others too!!" Another sign on the door reads, "No one under 21 admitted," "Valid ID required."

You just smile knowing that in America if you want something you can always buy it. Flashing your ID, you enter freely into what was the biggest fear of the late 80s. A salesman approaches questioning you with his service. Ignoring him in your daze, memories of the past appear like smoke before your eyes.

Drughibition it was called and you remember its end.

After years of debate, drugs became legal to use and the Country was divided. With the Un-tripping Drug, the Church was in uproar. Conservative fears were of widespread violence and desecration. The Church called the event the end of America. Panic seized the Country. Only after the crime rate dropped and the deficit vanished was there talk of success. Unable to admit defeat, the Church continued to protest regularly.

The streets of L.A. and New York became mellow, less violent. Taxes brought in have provided additional Medicare and Social Security benefits. Our country has not seen a healthier economy since the 50s. But all is not perfect.

There has been a dramatic increase in smoking marijuana which, in turn, has lung cancer on the rise. Cocaine usage has risen steadily, but the younger generation is not as infatuated with it as the latter was. The country was finally as free as when it was formed. What could be better.

"Splat." Reality smacks you in the face and again you examine your surroundings. Armageddon — this could be the generation which will face Armageddon. —Ronald Reagan.

Snorting away America's future

Drugs are a problem. My friends and fellow travellers who sun themselves outside the Student Union don't agree. They tell me everyone should try drugs, and that everyone does them. What is happening? Are drugs a problem in society? Or is society the problem and drugs the solution, as some of my peers argue?

"Drugs have been used for hundreds of years." Well, crimes have been taking place for hundreds of years. It still doesn't make it right. "People will use drugs whether there are laws or not." This is obvious, but murders are committed everyday — despite the laws. "Get the government involved and we can tax and regulate drug trade." I don't think the government should be involved in any business, especially in the business of feeding the children of this nation poison.

W. Greg Rothman

It is poison, isn't it? The medical community has thrown their collective arms up and warned Americans of the deadly harm of drugs. We all watched in horror as would-be Boston Celtic star Len Bias had his life go up in smoke. Dead. Over. Through. Yet how many kids stopped using drugs? According to a dear friend of mine who I met up with on a PVTA bus on the other day, "everyone is tripping lately." Why? Maybe they think drugs will improve their performances, like Olympic Champion Ben Johnson told us? Johnson lost his gold; he was lucky he didn't lose his life.

Life is supposed to be wonderful. It may not be all we want it to be (even Republicans have bad days) but tomorrow may be. I used to watch all of my beautiful classmates as I walked around campus. I now wonder what they are thinking. Why are they taking drugs? More important, why do they believe that drugs are not dangerous? I am not speaking about all students at UMass. I am concerned for those students who take drugs. Some even consider themselves Republicans. This issue transcends political parties; it doesn't transcend ideologies or attitudes.

Vice-President George Bush supports continuing the "war on drugs." This war makes the Vietnam War look like a landslide victory for the US. The truth is we're losing the war. Americans, young and old, are the victims of this plague and no one is willing to do more than talk about it. Values destroyed by liberals are what Bush should be talking about. Where was Jesse Jackson and the Democratic Party in the '60s and the early '70s when people were shouting "try it, everybody must get stoned"? Michael Dukakis is not even willing to throw a band-aid on a wound which needs a tourniquet. The Duke doesn't support increased penalties for dealers or users. He claims to want to wage a 'real' war on drugs, but his battle experience in Boston is tragic. The drug gangs roam free, recently committing the senseless murder of a 12-year-old girl in Roxbury. Tiffany Moore is dead, but my sunbathing friends and Libertarians still say drug use is a victimless crime.

My solutions may startle the sunbathers outside of the Student Union and my Libertarian pals. It is a simple economic solution: eliminate the demand. We must continue to punish the dealers, pushers and countries who supply the street scum who sell drugs. Moreover, punish the user, the casual user, harshly. As long as people are taking drugs, realizing that they are generally at little risk of being punished, there will be a supply of plenty. Education and soldiers may help us with this problem, but gains will not be evident until the users are sanctioned.

It isn't necessary to give the drug users the death penalty, they are sentencing themselves to that punishment. It's necessary to put those convicted of drug use and possession behind bars. Yes, friends, America was founded on the basis of individual rights.

More good than harm comes from nuclear power

When our newly elected president delivers his Inaugural Address in January, America's energy policy has a very slim chance of being discussed. Domestic and foreign affairs often grab the lion's share of political attention, and unless there are long lines at the neighborhood gas station, energy issues tend to take a backseat.

If energy policy is neglected in the Inaugural Address as expected, our next president won't be able to ignore this issue for long. US energy strategy not only has a significant impact on domestic and foreign affairs, but increasing concerns about global warming trends will also quickly force us to take this issue more seriously.

At recent congressional hearings, scientific experts explained that the 25 percent increase in the amount of carbon dioxide in the Earth's atmosphere over the last 100 years is causing a warming trend known as the "greenhouse effect." The excess carbon dioxide, largely caused by our burning of coal and other fossil-fuels to produce electricity and run our transportation, reduces the amount of heat that can escape into space and creates a situation similar to Venus, where temperatures soar. The experts warned that continued emission of carbon dioxide at current levels could cause catastrophic ecological damage. Shifting weather patterns and the melting of the polar ice caps might be the result.

Melissa Dobosz

A decrease in carbon dioxide emission is crucial, but it is unlikely, however, that our demand for energy will decrease in the coming years. In fact, our electricity use is growing faster than most forecasters predicted. In 1987, our use of electric power rose by 4.5 percent and demand is again rapidly accelerating this year. Since a cut in electrical use would seriously harm our economy and continued or increased burning of fossil-fuel will make a bad situation worse, it is clear that we cannot depend solely on coal and oil for the electricity we need.

One obvious alternative is nuclear power. Although nuclear power plants now have economic and licensing problems which can and should be corrected, nuclear energy is a proven and abundant resource that can serve our needs both economically and safely.

Nuclear power is already providing close to 20 percent of our electricity, and improved nuclear technologies offer much promise for the future.

In addition to alleviating the "greenhouse effect," nuclear energy frees us from dangerous dependence on imported foreign oil which, at $41 billion in 1987, is the second largest contributor to the US trade deficit. No doubt, this will also reduce our vulnerability to the catastrophic effects of another oil embargo.

Administration creating a police state with the Southwest substation

I am writing in anger over the proposed police substation in Southwest — to be located in Washington. There is not one legitimate reason for the presence of this police sub-station. The safety of students has never been greater. Each dorm has it's own security, along with constant on-duty resident assistants. Southwest is always patrolled by police vehicles and if the need arises, the presence of police officers is punctual.

The truth behind the sub-station is the administration's ongoing goal of making UMass dry. Slowly but surely, the administration is continuing the process of drying this campus and ending the 'Zoo Mass' reputation.

It started several years ago with the restriction of kegs in the dorms. Then there was the no-open-alcohol-container policy in the halls followed by the no Halloween visitors restrictions, the no drinking in outdoor area concerts policy, and finally, the massive crackdown on campus fraternities.

This year's target is Southwest. It is the students' last stronghold and the administration knows it. The chancellor will be rallying his storm troopers hoping to break the Southwest resistance force, and completely make the campus a totalitarian, dry police state. My friends and I will do everything possible to oppose this infringement and intimidation by the administration. I challenge our SGA co-presidents-elect (Shari Silkoff and Jason Rabinowitz) to join in our fight.

Contract signed for new jail in Dedham after 20-year wait

DEDHAM (AP) — State officials and Norfolk County leaders have signed contracts to begin design work for the new $42 million county jail, designed to house 242 inmates.

Sheriff Clifford Marshall said it took a 20-year campaign to push through the needed replacement of the century-old jail, particularly finding a site for the new facility.

"What made it was teamwork," he said Saturday. "There were different ideas and different egos. But with pride today, I can truly say it was a pleasure."

The site for the facility is the median strip between the northbound and southbound lanes of Massachusetts 128. The land is between Massachusetts 135 in Needham and Massachusetts 109 in Dedham.

The complex will require 122,000 square feet. It will include a jail, a house of correction, a pre-release center, a gymnasium, classroom and vocational training space, and a medical unit.

The design will take at least a year. Officials hope to have the jail completed in 1982.

The Federal Highway Administration in August approved construction of the jail.

The Massachusetts High Technology Council opposed the site, contending it would hurt the image of the area. The Associated Contractors of Massachusetts also opposed it, saying it would increase traffic on a congested road.

Rep. Marie-Louis Kehoe, D-Dedham, opposed the site, contending the jail is not large enough and there is no room for expansion.

"I think it is a good idea, but it doesn't belong in your dormitory. I mean, this is your home. You don't want people watching over you in your home," he said.

Hilson said the officers would only respond to incidents they witnessed first-hand, and would not roam the building.

"If on the way to a meeting on the fifth floor a police officer steps off of the elevator and witnesses what he believes to be a minor carrying alcohol, he has a duty to perform and has certain responsibilities he must follow," Hilson said.

The sub-station will be given its trial run this week and will be evaluated by the Department of Public Safety for effectiveness and acceptance, according to the officials endorsing the program.

WFSB Channel 3 in Hartford is the other initiator, with the Advocate of the program, Buehl said. Channel 3 will be running TV ads to urge people to eat out, he said.

Restaurants participating in Amherst include the Pub, the Gas Lite, Seasons, the Classe Cafe and Daisy's. In Hadley, Bread and Circus, Campus Pizza, Carburs, Figaro's, James H. McManus', Katina's and the Villager will take part.

Buehl said 12 restaurants in Northampton will also donate 10 percent of their receipts. He said participation in Northampton was urged by Mayor David Musante, who sent a letter to restaurants in the city when he learned of the program. The Valley Advocate will be running ads listing all restaurants in the area taking part.

Christine Lau, owner of the Classe Cafe in Amherst wasn't sure it would help her business, but was excited about the community spirit involved. "It's a good cause. . .and it's nice to be a part of something like that," Lau said.

Dorothy Glog, of Daisy's in North Amherst, echoed Lau, saying "It just sounded like a good thing to do."

The Western Massachusetts Food Bank, a non-profit organization based in Hatfield, has been in existence for six years. The food bank supplies about 125 human-service organizations throughout western Mass., Buehl said. "We are the largest means by which low-income people are fed in western Massachusetts," he said.

Intro. to The Short Story

When Carla told me that my date was a little short, I thought she was talking dollars and cents, not feet and inches. So there I was at the door, in my spiked heels, staring at the top of my date's head.

All I could think was, how do I get myself out of this? I could imagine how my legs would ache if I had to walk around with my knees bent all evening.

So to stall for time, while figuring out how to fake malaria, I made us some Double Dutch Chocolate.

When I brought it into the living room, I discovered that Gary was a chocolate lover too. Ahh, a man after my own heart. Okay, I decided I'd give him a chance. So we sat down and saw each other face-to-face for the first time. He had a nice smile.

After some small talk—I mean conversation—I discovered that we both love Updike, hate the winter weather, and both have miniature schnauzers. So, we made a date to introduce Shadow and Schatzi next week.

BLACK AFFAIRS

Lecture provides framework For Multiculturalism

JOSEPH L. HILL Jr.
Collegian Staff

The Office of Third World Affairs held the first of a series of fall lectures Wednesday, this one titled "The Dynamics of Multiculturalism."

Dr. Frederick Jefferson, assistant to the president for university and community affairs of the University of Rochester, was the host.

The lecturer attempted to answer question such as "Why is there prejudice?," "What is it about minorities that leads them to be discriminated against?" and "What is a core culture?"

Business and educational institutions that have cross-culture programs are no longer considered a novelty but an unavoidable result of the changing demographics of American society, he said.

Jefferson defined diversity as "a condition of being different." He described the three systems that people must travel through to attain diversity: belief, contact, and commitment.

Following these steps, people first learn that there is diversity in human creation, then seek limited contact with persons of different cultural backgrounds, and finally accept and support other cultures.

He outlined four stages of behavior experienced by people traveling through the three systems to reach diversity. These include:

● Isolate stage: where individuals develop ethnocentrism, having little or no contact with different ethnic groups; these people and are uncomfortable in presence of individuals from different races. One develops a group identity and a positive perception of his or herself.

● Inquiry stage: here individuals become aware of other cultures. There is a willingness to broaden their horizons. Non-contact investigation begins here (reading literature from other cultures is an example).

● Contact stage: persons here accept and respect other cultures. One becomes comfortable with direct contact with persons of different ethnic backgrounds, seeking brief immersion in other cultures. Persons in this stage also feel mutual enrichment from interaction with other ethnic groups.

● Integration stage; in this stage multiculturalism occurs. A mastery of communication with people from other cultures is evident at work place and in social spheres. People in this stage help devise programs to help others move from one stage to another.

This model can be used to organize programs that intend to be multi-cultural, and to evaluate existing programs. The ultimate goal of any multi-cultural organization should be "intentional growth in and between individuals" said Dr. Jefferson.

SNA Explores Diversity

By JOSEPH L. HILL Jr.
Collegian Staff

The Student Nurses Association is sponsoring a conference to be held Thursday, which will examine multi-cultural health care beliefs and practices.

The focus of the conference is to provide individuals with a cultural learning experience. The participants will include members of the nursing faculty and student body at the University of Massachusetts. Area nursing schools have also been invited to attend.

The conference will promote a cultural exchange between the participants and speakers. The panel will be composed of speakers from various ethnic and cultural backgrounds.

They will discuss health beliefs and practices as it relates to their culture, and the general implications various cultures have on the health care profession.

The following are topics up for discussion during the course of the day:

● Identification and discussion of the roots of racism and its effects on the health care system.

● Understanding cultural and ethnic health beliefs and behaviors.

● The importance of communicating with patients of different cultural and ethnic background.

● Recruitment and retention of minority students and faculty to the nursing department.

● Provide a network of nursing students and faculty at UMass with students and faculty at other campuses. "A holistic approach to health care," one that encompasses a "patients religious, social, educational, and financial background," needs to be addressed, said Pam Hewitt, SNA member.

The conference is an excellent opportunity for persons entering the health professions to examine these issues, she said. All persons are invited to attend.

The keynote address will be given by Alicia Georges, president of the National Black Nursing Association.

The SNA was reorganized in 1987 and 1988. Their office is located on campus, in Arnold House, and all nursing majors are members.

Centers provide study space

The Multi-Cultural Services Project, a program that has established three cultural centers in the east residential areas, benefits students of color.

Under the administration of Sally Majewski, advisor Ynez Wilkins and an 11-member student staff, a portion of the University of Massachusetts Cultural Enrichment Fund has been allocated to equip the centers to provide social, cultural, and tutorial programs primarily for students of color.

The largest of the centers is the Cultural Center located in Thatcher House in the Northeast Residential Area. There is also the Sylvan Cultural Society in Cashin House. The Martin Luther King Center, though under construction, is located in Dickinson House in Orchard Hill.

Each of the cultural centers is open for studying purposes Sundays through Thursdays from 7 to 11 p.m. A television and access to a VCR is also available in each center.

The facilities can also be used by private organizations that wish to take advantage of the centers. Any groups interested in doing so may find more information be calling 545-0422.

The Sylvan Cultural Center scheduled an open house for 8 p.m. last night. Persons who wish to apply for position of multicultural center coordinator may still pick up applications there. All others interested in utilizing the facilities are urged to contact Sally Majewski.

Third World Caucus update

THIRD WORLD CAUCUS REPORT

The Third World Caucus held its second regular meeting of the semester on Wensday, Sept. 28. The caucus approved a motion to create an ad-hoc committee for outreach to students and RSOs. Caucus members also discussed programming ideas for the upcoming "Civility Day" in October.

Corey Rinehart, a TWC governor, gave a brief report on the BOG space allocation conflict, in which TWC received office space for the first time since it was created in 1970. Other reports included the Student Coalition Against Apartheid and Racism march on the Department of Education in Washington D.C. on Oct. 14, in which all students are encouraged to join.

Also, the upcoming senate elections on Oct. 11 in which all students are urged to run from their dorms for effective representation in the Student Senate.

Dark Cowgirls and Praire Queens

By THOMAS MAMBANDE
Collegian Staff

This past weekend at Bowker Auditorium marked the Pioneer Valley's first glimpse at the Carpetbag Theatre and its presentation of "Dark Cowgirls and Prairie Queens."

The play, sponsored by the New World Theatre, portrays the lives of black women in the days of the untamed West.

Written by Linda Parris Bailey, the play recounts unsung heroes like Mary Fields, who single-handedly fought off starving wolves during a blizzard, and Biddy Mason, who walked from California to Texas behind her master's wagons (and cattle). She persevered eventually to win her freedom in court and earn enough money to build a nursing home.

The cast of Dark Cowgirls and Prairie Queens consists of Linda C. Upton, Adora Dupree, Jeffrey L. Cody, Victor L. Cranford, and Linda Parris-Bailey who, in addition to having written the play, also directs it.

The Carpetbag Theatre, founded in 1970 by W.F. Lucas, is one of the oldest surviving black theater companies in the South. The touring company is based in Knoxville, Tenn.

Of the Carpetbag Theatre, Parris Bailey said: "We are committed to making the voices of our community heard and we want to give something back to the community — a positive image of itself."

ARTS/LIVING

Video artist views life through the lens

By JENNIFER DEMPSEY
Collegian Staff

John Furbish understands why some university art professors shun him.

"I am the very antithesis of the kind of artist that comes from these Five College systems," said the 43-year old Amherst video artist whose latest project "P/CP: Paul Cameron Putdown" airs tomorrow night on channel 10.

"I have never gone to art school. I am a non-academic, untrained artist, which makes me more primitive and naive than conventional. I am probably a threatening figure to academic figures," he said.

Furbish admits he occasionally goes to professors for advice on the latest developments in video, but he claims his most reliable inspiration for art is music.

"Particularly british music from the late 60's," he said. "It hit me at a more feeling level. It's awesome the way you can grow through feeling music. It presents feelings and intuition more than the cerebral stuff. I immerse myself in music. I learn more from hardcore punk than figure drawing 121."

And through video, Furbish said, people can learn more about each other than through any other form of media.

"I consider myself a humanist and video is the most humanistic means I can deal with," he said. "It's a participatory medium, people become part of it. The new lightweight stuff can let you get closer than face to face. As a humanist, empathy is the fundamental approach to the world. Video allows intimate involvement with other people through what they do and say and how they look."

And, he added with a laugh, it is easy.

"I'm a low tech person and you can't fuck up with a PXL toy camera that is so simple a child can operate it. And," he added with a grin, "mistakes can even be made into more ways of expression. So perhaps we should all become less competent in our thinking."

Furbish has been involved in video art since he moved to the Valley in the late 70's. Using production facilities from the Union Video Center at UMass and resources from Amherst Community Television, Furbish has produced hundreds of videos with support from the Amherst Arts Council and the Herter Art Gallery.

All his work, he said, carries a political or social message.

"P/CP" is very politicized and highly biased," he stated. "It's a politicized artistic mix of Paul Cameron's facist speech on the steps of the Student Union Building and a counter rally to the homophobic expressions."

"Which One Is Green?" which will air 8 p.m. on October 27th at the Jones Library is "an argument for kind of like a green earth. It promotes the green earth concept as well as my own political scene," he said. "This is even more biased than "P/CP."

Tom Waits
Island Records

A live album is a decidely dodgy item at the best of times, but if you're old and/or wise enough, you'll know the exception to this rule is Tom Waits' Nighthawks at the Diner, a gloriously boozy evocation of every sleazy, smoke-filled back street dive you've ever imbibed in and plenty you haven't too.

Well, guess what? Old Gravel Guts has done it again with Big Time which puts into perspective the outstandingly innovative trilogy of albums Waits has recorded since he signed to Island. And in doing so, he finally lays to rest some of the old ghosts he collected in his years at Asylum.

You can hear what I mean in the opening shot, "Sixteen Shells From a Thirty-Ought Six" where the band is tighter than a parade drum and out of control at the same time, and the demented guitar solo squeals like some bastard child of Anton Karras and Muddy Waters.

"Way Down In The Hole," presents Waits the performer at full tilt in a grotesque pardoy of an evangelist, sounding like he's been vomited up from the bowels of hell itself. Then, unusual for a live album, we get a new studio track, a taster for a new sound perhaps. "Falling Down" is an achingly beautiful cajun-style waltz that'll have you swirling around in sweet oblivion.

Returning to the live context, Waits sings "Strange Weather" like a bronchial Edith Piaf and I'm prepared to believe he's seen and done it all before many times over, but he's nothing if not constantly springing surprises. So "Big Black Mariah" is slowed down and turned around so it's almost unrecognizable and yet it sticks in your brain like a frontal lobotomy.

I could go on at great length discussing the considerable merits of all the tracks like the epic, moving "Train Song" or the riotous "Telephone Call From Istanbul" with its killer line "never drive a car when you're dead" — but I think you've got the picture.

Anyway, one thing is for sure: after taking over the Asylum, this lunatic has finally escaped from it.

"John Grillo: An Oral History," which will be shown Oct. 14 in Herter 227 is part of a series on three local artists over the age of 70. Grillo, Fred Becker and Robert Mallary "were a great influence to me," Furbish said. "Working with them I've been able to become more youthful. It's awesome."

Furbish said a video he sent to MTV last week - a Valentine's Day tape with a message to George Bush - is a bit off-the-wall, but it doesn't compare with a project he has been working on for almost 5 years.

"This is the strangest thing I've got going," Furbish said of a musical horror movie that he has tentatively titled "Tommy II."

"It's a rock opera about a blitzed rapist and it creates a sense of empathy with both the agressor and the victim. I think I go beyond horror to a point of terror," he said.

Furbish said while he will continue to incorporate messages in his work, he hopes to become "less adamanistic . . . and much more wholistic. I find I have to become a more positive artist. Instead of being anti-facist, I will promote tolerance. I don't believe in the world of 'us and them.' All people are as one; all life forms are as one. And even stranger, all life and non-life forms are as one."

Theatre brings vintage films to Valley

By ANDRE BUSI
Collegian Correspondent

It's been about 12 years since Northampton's Pleasant Street Theatre was only showing Hollywood classics. Since then, it has broadened its range, setting the trend in the Valley by featuring foreign films as well as other alternatives to first-run Hollywood releases. Today Pleasant Street remains the only independent film house in the area.

Making esoteric films available to audiences in the Valley was an obsession shared by John Morrison and Richard Pini long before they bought the theater in 1976. Before that, they managed the Five College Film Co-op, shuttling vintage films from campus to campus, by bicycle if necessary, in order to satisfy local movie fans.

Within a year the Pleasant Street became the first local theater to show first-run foreign cinema, which until then was a luxury that could be found only in large cities. Ten years ago, watching a foreign film meant dealing with a foreign language, either through subtitles or (shudder) voice-overs.

Recently, the English-speaking cinema has given a wider display of nationalities, with the success of Australian films and the resurgence of the British film industry. Also, the popularity of independent filmmakers in the United States has grown so that there are more alternatives to the major studios. Though other theaters, such as the Academy of Music and the AMC theaters in the malls, have started to tap into this resource, Pleasant Street has been doing it the longest.

Because of the relatively small seating capacity (there are a total 170 seats between the upper and lower showcases), the managers are obligated to find films that are likely to be popular. Unlike a theater belonging to a large cinema chain, an independent theater can guarantee the film's distributors only modest profits. This makes film rental a gamble, and films must be chosen with a specific audience in mind.

The audience, surprisingly enough, is usually connected to the Five College area, such as faculty, administration members and, yes, even students. In fact, students form a large part of the Pleasant Street audience, so Morrison and Pini make it a point to keep interesting films circulating.

Since the smaller theater on the lower level costs so little to maintain, they can usually afford to show rarer films while also showing more mainstream films upstairs. In the end, this means a wider variety of films.

With this shuttling in of fresh bodies, UMass was finally able to break out in the second half. But it wasn't until there was 15 minutes to play that the Minutewomen finally got the game-winner.

Michelle Powers crossed a corner kick to the far left into the goal mouth, where April Kater headed it past Crusader goalkeeper Sarah Porell, giving UMass the win.

Friday night's win was a bit more dramatic than yesterday's. After playing scoreless well into the second half, UMass and the host Lady Knights traded late second half goals before the Minutewomen tallied in overtime for a 2-1 win.

UMass had its chances to break into the scoring column early on, including shots by Powers and Michelle Woodside that got foiled at the last moment.

Woodside would later capitalize, knocking home a loose ball rebound off a corner kick. The original shot was blocked, but bounced out to Woodside, who left-footed a shot from about 18 yards out that the goalkeeper couldn't handle.

UMass held the lead until late in regulation when Nicki Hoekstra, a former player of Rudy's at the University of Central Florida, took a corner kick above the zone defense and headed it past goalkeeper Carla DeSantis, only the second goal that DeSantis has allowed all season.

"I think Carla lost it in the lights. She misjudged it," Rudy said.

However, UMass would get it back in the overtime on a pretty goal. Kater made a through run and Sue Gaudette hit a perfect ball into the penalty area, which forced the keeper out of position. Kater hit it and the goalie blocked it, but freshman Theresa "Clint" Eastmond crossed in from the right flank and one-touched it to Powers who, according to Rudy, "sky-walked," making about a 25-inch vertical leap to head it into the far corner.

That goal marked the second victory of the year for UMass over the Lady Knights. The Minutewomen had opened the season with a 2-0 win over Rutgers at the Rhode Island Tournament.

But this time Rutgers was a different team.

"It seems tht everybody is getting up for us," Rudy said. "They played harder and more physical, plus there was the turf. I'm glad the field was large."

Among everything else, Rudy believes playing on the fake stuff was a big problem for his team.

"I'll tell you this right now, no turf next year. I don't care who it is," Rudy said. "It's ludicrous. We can't train on it. It's just a killer."

Rudy and his team will be glad to finally be getting home to real grass and the friendly confines of Boyden Field tomorrow, when they will host the University of New Hampshire.

"New Hampshire will be ready for us," Rudy said. "But if we can pull off winning four games in seven days, we can do anything."

In the first drive of the second half, trailing 27-20, UMass marched to the B.U. 1-yard line before Palazzi threw an interception in the end zone.

But three drives later, UMass safety Vaughn Williams intercepted a Jeff Schuman pass and returned it 17 yards. UMass then drove to the Terrier 15-yard line before Silvio Bonvini nailed a 33-yard field goal to make it 27-23.

On the second play after the kickoff, Charron hit Schuman, causing a fumble and John McKeown, a game captain along with Chip Mitchell and Bill Buttler, recovered.

"They were bigger than we were on both sides of the ball," B.U. coach Chris Palmer said. "Our kids hung in in the first half but by the third quarter they started to wear us down."

After a Palazzi-to-Dimitri Yavis completion, Smellie carried five straight times before Palazzi ran in from the 7-yard line to give the Minutemen a 30-27 lead.

The UMass defense forced the Terriers to punt after three plays following the kickoff, and, after a 22-yard return by Jerome Bledsoe, UMass was on its way.

Tailback Steve Olson scored on an 8-yard run to make it 37-27 with 10:29 to go in the fourth quarter, before an interesting set of circumstances led to the Minutemen's final score.

Yavis boomed a 77-yard punt (another UMass record), which was returned to the Terrier 15, and on the next play, Steve Brothers hit new B.U. quarterback Walter Norton, causing a fumble that Charron pounced on. Four plays later, Palazzi scored from the 1.

"David had his moments but he's still our leader," Reid said. "I still have great confidence and trust in him. He made the big plays when he had to."

In the first half, neither team made the big plays, but B.U. made fewer mistakes and ended the half with the lead.

"I think the ground had more carries than anyone else in the first half," Palazzi joked.

B.U. took advantage of the mistakes to build a seven-point lead, but found out that wasn't enough against UMass.

"It's kind of scary if we can win a game like this," Palazzi said. "Imagine what we could do if we did everything right."

However, the fouling did not pay off for the Black Bears, who gave up 12 penalty corners on the afternoon. One foul about half way through the first half gave UMass a penalty corner which they capitalized on.

Senior Julie Stuart received a pass from senior co-captain Ruth Vasapolli on the resulting play and beat Maine goalie Debbie McSweeney to give the Minutewomen a 1-0 lead at 18:00 of the first half.

And that is all that UMass senior goaltender Cindy Cox needed as she went on to record her seventh shutout of the year, posting eight saves for the game.

The Minutewomen carried a slim 1-0 lead into halftime but in the second half added an insurance goal at 7:06 when they picked up another goal on a penalty corner as junior Mara Fratassio beat McSweeney (20 saves) to give UMass a 2-0 lead. Stuart assisted on the play.

Sophomore Elise McDevitt extended that lead to 3-0 when she scored, unassisted, at 24:06 of the second half. The Minutewomen outshot the Black Bears 31-11 in the game.

On Friday, freshman Masike Hilbrand's goal with 59 seconds left in the first overtime lifted Old Dominion to a 1-0 win over UMass at Totman Field. ODU is now 9-0.

The Minutewomen had several opportunities to win this game in regulation but UMass either just missed finishing off a play or were turned away by a great save from sophomore goalie Kathy Fosina.

The Minutewomen received two excellent chances to score when they drew two penalty strokes, one in the first half and one in the second.

On the first stroke with about 2:38 left in the first half, junior Kathy DeAngelis unloaded a shot that was headed toward the upper left hand corner of the Lady Monarch goal before Fosina picked it off.

The officials awarded UMass another stroke with 16:31 left in the second half when DeAngelis was tripped as she walked in on Fosina.

But DeAngelis, who has converted on a majority of her strokes this season, sent the ball wide left on the penalty shot.

"I'm disappointed that we didn't tie or win because we had our chance," Hixon said. "We had a lot of chances. But at this point if you have to take a loss, this is a good loss."

Old Dominion hardly outplayed the Minutewomen in the 80 minute game. The shots were about even, the Lady Monarchs holding a slight 14-13 edge. Cox and Fosina both made 10 saves.

ODU drew 10 penalty corners as opposed to six for UMass but the Minutewomen actually had more scoring opportunities as Stuart tested Fosina on a number of PC's. The Monarchs on the other hand, with the UMass defense charging at them, failed to handle the incoming pass on almost every play.

But if the Minutewomen did get one thing out of this game, it was the confidence that they can stay right with the top teams in the country. ODU has played the University of North Carolina, the University of Maryland, and the University of Iowa, all of which have been ranked in the top ten in the country this season. Old Dominion coach, Beth Anders was impressed with UMass to say the least.

"I think right now, everything is up for grabs," Anders said. "I think we have five or six teams that are really fighters."

Freshman Brett Anthony waited until the second overtime period of Saturday's contest to score the first goal of his eight game UMass career, teaming with Hanks to down the Mountaineers of West Virginia.

After 100 minutes and 45 seconds of scoreless play, Anthony capitalized on goalie Mark Batchelder's inability to hang on to the ball on a close range shot by Hanks, steering the rebound across the goal line. The Minuteman defense, keyed by the return of senior goaltender Sam Ginzburg, held firm through the final nine minutes of frantic play to preserve the shutout.

Minutemen assault Boston U., 44-27

Palazzi sets records; defense comes alive

By MATT GERKE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts football team went through a metamorphosis Saturday at halftime of its game against Boston University.

In the second half, the offense returned to normal and the defense played like it hadn't yet this season, and the two were more than enough to offset a horrible first half and allow UMass to defeat the Terriers, 44-27, at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

The Minutemen remain undefeated at 2-0 in the Yankee Conference and improve to 3-1 overall. BU drops to 1-2 in the conference and 1-3 overall.

UMass lost four fumbles in the first half, had a punt partially blocked, senior quarterback Dave Palazzi threw an interception that was returned 35 yards, and kicker Silvio Bonvini missed an extra point.

"I'm not sure I've ever seen a poorer first half from every standpoint," UMass head coach Jim Reid said. "And at halftime, I told them I didn't think we were going to win. But people stepped forward and we decided it was time to put up or shut up."

But in the second half UMass played like a team that deserves to be tied with Villanova for first place in the conference.

"We were hit hard by the flu last week and our timing may have been off in the beginning," Reid said. "But I honestly feel conditioning won out in the end."

That and the UMass defense, which surrendered just five first downs while shutting the Terriers out during the second half. UMass allowed just 37 yards rushing, none in the second half.

"We just practiced better this week. We said to ourselves 'This can't go on,'" senior defensive tackle Dan Charron said of the defense's problems. "That got us going emotionally and it's always easy to get up for a conference game."

Charron was charged up, and contributed three tackles and two pass deflections, recovered a fumble and caused another.

Inside linebacker George Karelas led UMass in tackles with 10, and also broke up a pass and recovered a fumble.

"The entire defense played great," Karelas said. "I don't think we were that bad in the first half but we adjusted at halftime and really got the job done."

The offense also got the job done in the second half, scoring 24 points to come from behind and win it.

The news was not so much that the offense rolled, since UMass has scored at least 44 points in three of its four games. But they did it Saturday without the services of the starting fullback David Mitchell and backup Jim Pastorick, who both left the game in the first half with leg injuries.

But sophomore Duncan McRae filled in more than adequately.

"Duncan McRae has never opened his mouth about being the No. 3 fullback," Reid said. "When we get an injury, we need another man to step forward and be accountable. Duncan did a tremendous job. He blocked well on blitzes and gave us some big runs."

Tailback Kevin Smellie also helped pick up the load in the second half and finished with 117 yards rushing and a touchdown.

And Palazzi, who struggled in the first half, finished 20-of-38 for 260 yards, a touchdown and two interceptions.

Palazzi also broke two UMass career records Saturday, for total offense (was 4898, now 5084) and completions (was 316, now 324). Both records were held by Peil Pennington, who was the UMass quarterback from 1971-73.

"I got down on myself a little in the first half," Palazzi said. "But we just stuck with it. That's what this team does. And if we keep doing that, we'll be all right."

UMass falls to ODU, but tops Maine

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

After a heartbreaking overtime loss on Friday, the University of Massachusetts' field hockey team rebounded yesterday with a 3-0 shutout of the University of Maine.

The Minutewomen's unbeaten streak was broken on Friday by top ranked Old Dominion University. After yesterday's victory over the Black Bears, UMass' record stands at 8-1.

Making the six hour trip to Maine took its toll on Minutewomen who were ranked fourth in the country by the NCAA coming into this weekend.

"We didn't have much legs today because of our lack of our recovery time from Friday's game," UMass coach Pam Hixon said.

Maine, now 2-3, was not going to make things easy for the Minutewomen. The Black Bears play only contributed more to the fatigued UMass team.

"Maine is a physically tough team," Hixon said. "They foul alot."

Men's soccer beats West Virginia and Siena in UM Challenge Cup

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Correspondent

While the Terriers of Boston University emerged from this weekend's Massachusetts Challenge Cup soccer tournament with the silver dish and armfuls of gold medallions, the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team came away with a pair of victories over West Virginia and Siena, an improved record in the Atlantic 10 (2-1 overall, 1-1 vs. the A-10 East), silver medallions for the trophy case, and a host of well-fed and well-entertained parents and alumni.

The homecoming party lifted the spirits of the Minutemen, who were desperately in need of a boost following last week's 0-3 road outing to Dartmouth, Vermont and Yale. By beating A-10 rival West Virginia 1-0 in double overtime Saturday, then recovering to down Siena 2-0 yesterday afternoon, UMass improved its season's record to 5-4.

The Terriers, who entered the tournament as the No. 18 ranked team in the nation, blanked Siena 3-0 on Saturday, then outgunned the Mountaineers 4-1 yesterday afternoon. By besting the Minutemen in the overall scoring department, B.U. was awarded the tournament title.

Sophomore Carl Hanks was responsible for both of the tallies in yesterday's effort against Siena, as the Minutemen applied steady, and at times cautious, pressure on the defense of the visiting Indians. Hanks burst through the defensive freeze with an opportunistic goal in each half of play, breaking the ice on what had been a scoreless season for the sophmore forward.

At the 24:38 mark of the first half midfielder Michael Mugavero placed the ball behind a pair of Siena defensemen on a throw in, where Hanks beat goaltender Carlos Duran with a hook slide and poked the ball into the net. The goal left the Minutemen with a 1-0 lead.

Hanks waited through an hour of play before adding his second goal of the season to the scoreboard. With just 1:41 left on the clock, Hanks redirected a ricochet off Duran's back through the goalposts after Duran was unable to hold a scorching long distance drive off the foot of freshman Darren Stone.

Though the Minutemen outshot their guests by a 32-8 margin, coach Jeff Gettler expressed frustration that his squad capitalized just twice.

"We need to be more committed to really go to goal," said Gettler. "Sometimes we're not direct enough, and we certainly weren't urgent enough in a lot of our play . . . we really needed to make the ball move quicker."

Gettler did reserve praise, however, for Hanks and Mugavero, referring to both of their contributions as "outstanding."

Volleyball dumped by GW in three

By RONN GARRY
Collegian Staff

There aren't very many good things to say about the University of Massachusetts volleyball team's loss against host George Washington University on Friday.

By losing in three straight games, 5-15, 7-15, 7-5 the Minutewomen (9-1) were convicingly handed their first defeat of the year. "This was the first match of the season where we played terribly. But we are not going to dwell on it, we are going to take it from here," UMass coach Carol Ford said.

The loss is by no means catasophic for UMass even though it was the first Atlantic 10 match of the year. The problem i?the Minutewomen have played brilliantly through the front-nine of the season, so what happened on Friday?

"It was basically our passing. We had no passing — no offense," Ford said.

"Even on defense, we were digging so close to the net that we couldn't get our passing on track," Ford said.

And the numbers tell the story. UMass could only gather 20 kills (registering a negative .090 hitting efficiency), no blocks, and 12 service errors in the entire match. No UMass player had more than five kills. "We have a lot of things to clean up, because it won't get any easier after this," Ford said. "It started off from the very first serve with no passing. We were never in the game. We can't be starting slow. They didn't do anything fancy. We just didn't do anything in return. When we did pass well, they had some errors. It was a very quick match."

The only new wrinkle the Colonials added against UMass was the "Slide"— where the GW hitters would hit from behind the setter, but Ford said she didn't think the slide affected the outcome.

The Minutewomen will have a chance to redeem the GW loss this Friday when they travel to Olean N.Y. to play A-10 opponent St. Bonaventure University.

That will give UMass five days to erase George Washington from its minds and prepare for the Bonnies.

"I'm glad we have the time off. We have a lot to do this week," Ford said.

Shuttle returns from sucessful mission

By The Associated Press

EDWARDS AIR FORCE BASE, Calif. — Discovery's five astronauts streaked out of orbit to a triumphant, flag-waving desert landing yesterday after a remarkably smooth post-Challenger flight that "resumed the journey" of Americans into space.

"Roger Discovery, welcome back. A great ending to the new beginning," Mission Control's Blaine Hammond told the crew after Commander Frederick Hauck guided the 97 ton shuttle to a pinpoint touchdown on the center line of hard-packed sand runway.

Touchdown came exactly on target at 9:37 a.m. PDT, ending a 1.68 million-mile voyage that lasted four days, one hour and 57 seconds.

Two loud sonic booms crackled over the California desert as Discovery descended through blue skies to the cheers of more than 300,000 spectators many of them waving American flags. The music of the Star-Spangled Banner played over loudspeakers.

Hauck waved a giant American flag himself as he and his crew left the shuttle 55 minutes later, walking down a ramp decorated with six smaller flags. They were greeted by Vice President George Bush and senior NASA officials, and after posing for photographs they gave Bush a walk-around tour of the shuttle, which looked virtually unscathed from the fiery re-entry.

The textbook landing capped a comeback mission that marked America's return to manned spaceflight after an absence of 32 months. The flight had begun tensely last Thursday when the $1.5 billion shuttle soared off its launch pad powered by a pair of the booster rockets that were redesigned after they were blamed for Challenger explosion. Those new rockets, and just about everything else on this shakedown flight, performed splendidly.

The shuttle crew took time on Sunday to deliver a eulogy to the crew of the shuttle Challenger which exploded on liftoff 32 months ago, saying, "At this moment our place in the heavens makes us feel closer to them than ever before."

Said astronaut John M. Lounge, "It's good to be back to where they wanted to go so badly."

Gathered in Discovery's middeck in front of a photograph of the Challenger crew, the crew took turns reading the statement they had written.

"Today, up here where the blue sky turns to black we can say at long last to Dick, Mike, Judy, to Ron and El, and to Christa ang Greg: 'Dear friends we have resumed the journey that we promised to continue for you. Dear friends, your loss has meant that we can confidently begin anew. Dear friends, your spirit and your dreams are still alive in our heart.'"

The seven who died aboard Challenger were Richard Scobee, Michael Smith, Judith Resnick, Ronald McNair, Ellison Onizuka, Christa McAuliffe and Gregory Jarvis.

Station draws fire from Washington residents

By THOMAS RODRIGUES
Collegian Staff

Although the fledgling police sub-station in Washington Residence Hall is trying to learn how to fly, students are fighting to kill the animal before it leaves its nest.

The sub-station, placed in the lobby of Washington Saturday but not officially opened, is drawing heavy flak from residents of the Southwest dormitory.

Spearheading the attack against the sub-station is Jeff Filipov, 23-year-old 14th floor resident of Washington Tower. He said he wants more student signatures the petition he started on Sept. 22, which already contains about 200.

Filipov said there were about 300 more signatures on the petition but he neglected to obtain student identification numbers with every endorsement.

"The administration is not in touch with the students. The average student is not represented," Filipov said.

Last Wednesday Filipov confronted Executive Director of Public Safety Arthur Hilson on student input and feedback concerning the sub-station's location.

Filipov asked Hilson if it was possible to construct a student survey which would give the administration an idea of how students felt about having the sub-station in their dormitory.

However, when Hilson proposed they set up a meeting with Student Affairs Research and Evaluation Office (SAREO) in order to utilize Project Pulse, a telephone polling service, Filipov declined, saying he had other things to do, Hilson said.

"When students have a concern I have no problems with going out and facing them. That is the way I work. I like to meet students at the front door, any time, any place," Hilson said.

The sub-station, if proven effective in its mission to promote a more positive image of the Public Safety Department and improve police/student relations, is the forerunner of sub-stations destined for each residential area.

A second section of the sub-station located on the 5th floor of Washington Tower will be used for meetings, training sessions and conferences with security personnel. Together both segments of the sub-station are part of Hilson's PEACE program designed to educate and enhance the performance of the Public Safety Department.

Filipov is afraid the administration will work from the office "unnoticed" for a few weeks and then draw the conclusion that the station is being accepted, paving the way for the other sub-stations.

Students were eager to respond to recent articles published in this paper when contacted.

"I'd rather they (the police) not be here. It kind of defeats the purpose of having freedom in your dormitory," said first year Washington Tower resident Julie Schmalenberger.

"It's intimidating. What happens if we come home from a party stumbling around, do we get arrested? It's unfair. I don't have a police station in my home. The whole thing is aggravating and annoying," said junior 6th floor resident Andrea Wainer.

Most of the students contacted said that so far the sub-station idea had not only failed in easing the tension between police and students but has very likely opened the gap wider.

Nader to speak tonight on education cuts

By JOHN SWANSON
Collegian Staff

Ralph Nader, whose name has become synonymous with consumer advocacy, will speak tonight at 8 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium.

Nader's topic will be "Budget Cuts in Education." His 1965 book Unsafe At Any Speed questioned the quality and safety of many automobiles manufactured in the United States. The book led to the recall of millions of vehicles and helped make seat belts a standard safety feature in automobiles.

The presentation is the first in the Distinguished Visitors Program's fall lecture series. DVP Co-Chairperson Patrick Berkley said Nader's topic is "pertinent to all members of a university community."

"Nader is persistent in his attempt for change. His attitude is 'If you don't like what you see, do something about it.' Lots of people have good intentions for improvements, but for Mr. Nader, good intentions aren't good enough. You need action. Nader epitomizes the belief that one person can make a difference," he said.

The University of Massachusetts Conservative Alliance issued a press release yesterday announcing that it will hold a press conference "at 12 noon denouncing the campus visit of Ralph Nader." The release stated that the conference will be held in the hall outside of the Minuteman office in Student Union room 322, across from Earthfoods.

Alliance Chairman W. Greg Rothman is quoted in the release as saying "Ralph Nader is one of the most vicious and paranoid political activists in the country. At best he is a self-promoting ideologue, at worst he is a hypocrit (sic). We do not welcome him or his left-wing PIRGs on this campus." Nader helped establish the nationwide network of Public Interest Research Groups (PIRGs) and the environmental watchdog organization.

Berkley said that Virginia Wesoloski, scheduling coordinator for the Student Activities Office, did not give the alliance prior approval for the conference.

Nader, 54, is a native of Winsted, Conn. He attended Princeton University and Harvard Law School. His testimony before a Senate investigating committee, along with Unsafe At Any Speed, contributed to the passage of the 1966 National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act. In 1968, Nader founded the Center for the Study of Responsive Law, which addressed such issues as health hazards in mining, abuses in nursing homes and misleading advertising.

Tickets are free and available at the Fine Arts Center Box Office and at Bowker before the show.

SC to hear vacation pay dispute

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court said yesterday it will hear arguments on a Massachusetts case questioning whether state generally may prosecute employers for withholding accrued vacation pay owed fired workers.

The Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts ruled last May that the federal Employee Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA) preempts state prosecution of a bank president accused of denying vacation pay to two fired vice presidents.

The vacation pay was part of the bank employee benefit plan, and state are barred by ERISA from using criminal laws to enforce such plans, the state court said.

"We conclude that company policy providing for payments to employees upon discharge of unused vacation time is an employee welfare benefit plan within ERISA," the state court said.

It added that the situation would be different if, for example, state officials alleged that an employer stole money form and employee benefit plan. That type of misconduct would be subject to state laws prohibiting thievery, the state court said..

ERISA is designed to protect worker benefits, but it differs from a criminal law providing fines and jail terms for violators.

The Massachusetts court barred the prosecution of Richard Morash, president of the Yankee Bank for Finance and Savings.

The Yankee Companies Inc, in May 1984 acquired the financially troubled Home Savings Bank.

Two vice presidents, Chrisopher Winslow and William Tuttle, were fire a year later. Winslow said the bank owed him $14,520 for 66 unused vacation days and Tuttle said he was owed $11,146 fro 42 unused vacation days.

State prosecutors filed criminal charges against Morash after he refused to pay most of the money the two vice presidents claimed they were owed.

Morash was accused of violating a state law that applies specifically to employers who do not pay wages to workers, including vacation benefits. Such laws are preempted by ERISA, the Massachusets court ruled.

Two killed in recent police chase accidents

NEW BEDFORD, Mass (AP) — A New Bedford teenager killed during the weekend was the second person to die in circumstances involving a police chase in Massachusetts in less than six weeks.

Richard A. Correia, 17, was pronounced dead at about 10:45 Saturday night at the intersection of Tarkiln Road and Prescot Street, and the mother reportedly disputed the police account of the accident.

State police said Correia was killed instantly when thrown form his car and pinned under it after it collided with the side of a state police cruiser that was chasing a driver suspected of being drunk.

A passenger in Correia's car Kevin Flynn, 16 was admitted to St. Luke's Hospital, and State Trooper Howard K. Eaton, 36, an eight-year veteran of the force, was treated there and discharged.

On Aug 25, Daivd Gonzales, 23, of Acton was killed on the Massachusetts Turnpike when his truck was hit by an allegedly stolen car that had been chased by state and other police and was gong the wrong was on the highway.

"He got clobbered by the cop," Nancy Correia, step mother of Saturday night's victim, told the Standard Times of New Bedford.

"If the cop had his sirens on, if he had slowed down, Richie would still be alive today."

State Police Cpl. Joseph Howley said Eaton had turned on the cruiser's sirens and warning lights while pursuing a vehicle, which got away, and that Eaton slowed to 30 to 35 mph going through the intersection which has no traffic lights or stop signs.

"The trooper did slow down for the intersection." Howley said. "Another five feet and he would have been through."

Reps claim 35K in expenses

BOSTON (AP) — State representatives have collected nearly $35,000 in daily expense money since the House last met formally almost three months ago, according to expense records.

House members pocketed a total of $34,952 in so-called per diem allowance since the recess began on July 16, the Boston Herald reported today.

Of the 157 sitting representatives, 110 of them have collected per diem expenses averaging $317.75 per lawmaker during the continuing break, the newspaper said. The claims have ranged from one day's expenses to 51 days.

"If they come in here, they are entitled to it," Al Frezza, spokesman for House Speaker George Kerian, said today. "They have work to do here." Although the House has not met formally sing delivering an $11.6 billion budget to Gov. Michael S. Dukakis in July, representative have been coming back to the Statehouse "taking care of constituent work, dealing with issues important to their districts and some are working on legislative commissions," Fezza said.

Umass gets money for worker learning program

By YANA DLUGY
Collegian Staff

Secretary of Labor Paul Eustace yesterday presented $43,500 to Chancellor Joseph Duffey to fund the Workplace Education Program at the University of Massachusetts.

The program provides literacy services to the employees of the University.

Eustace said the program so far has been successful and encouraged people to take advantage of it.

It gives employees "a little 'shot in the arm' to get a little bit more education than they would ordinarily get," he said.

Rep. Stan Rosenberg, D-Amherst, attended the ceremony and praised everyone involved with the project.

"We are very lucky in Massachusetts that there are people who are willing to support this effort," he said. "They are definitely running on a shoestring and we need to beef that up."

The program was started in 1984 by the Staff Training and Development Unit of the Division of Human Resources and last year Local 1776 of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees joined the effort.

The program offers three major services: Adult Basic Education, English as a Second Language, and General Education Diploma instruction.

The approximately 1,250 members of the union are the program's primary targets. During its first year it served about 25 employees, but since last year 58 more people have been added to that list.

This is the second year the state will donate money towards the project, with the same amount being donated this year as last year. In return for receiving the money from the state, the University and union must contribute about 40 percent of the state grant, or $16,000.

Police arrest 60 for alcohol violations over weekend

By THOMAS RODRIGUES
Collegian Staff

This past weekend was a busy one for Amherst police and their lockup which was full on Friday and Saturday nights with the 60 arrests they made on varied alcohol violations.

Police strictly enforced drinking laws with nine cruisers patrolling the town. Most of the charges were either minors in possession of alcohol, operating a motor vehicle under the influence of alcohol or violations of the open container law, according to Amherst police's Sgt. James Doleva.

- A Pelham man was arrested Friday on Commonwealth Ave. on a warrant issued from the Franklin Police Department.
- A green, 10-speed Peugot mountain bike valued at $225 was stolen Friday from the bike rack it was locked to at James Residence Hall.
- On Friday a Macintosh computer worth $1,600 was stolen from a parked vehicle in the lower level of the Campus Center garage.
- A South Dennis man was arrested Friday in lot 22 for being a minor in possession of alcohol and carrying false information to obtain Massachusetts liquor identification card.
- A Westborough woman was stopped in her vehicle on Massachusetts Ave. Saturday and arrested for operating a motor vehicle under the influence, not having a license in her possession and going the wrong way down a one way street.
- A Brockton man was arrested on Saturday near the Campus Center Way for being a minor in possession of alcohol.
- A Panasonic answering machine worth $80 was stolen Saturday from a room in John Quincy Adams Residence Hall.
- An Indian Orchard woman was arrested on Massachusetts Ave. Saturday for operating a motor vehicle without a license and speeding.
- On Sunday a Dorchester man was arrested at John Adams Residence Hall for assault and battery and assault and battery with a dangerous weapon.
- An Enfield man acting suspiciously near Washington Residence Hall was arrested on an outstanding warrant from the Spencer Police Department.

Disability committee discusses concerns of handicapped people

By CHRIS WILLEY
Collegian Correspondent

With the numerous problems this country is experiencing at home and abroad, attention is constantly drawn away from a large number of people — those with developmental disabilities.

By definition, developmental disabilities are chronic mental and/or physical impairments, which limit the major life activities people accomplish without really thinking about them. These disabilities tend to be lifelong and nothing, as of yet, can be done about them.

The Western Massachusetts Regional Advisory committee to the Massachusetts Developmental Disabilities Council (MDDC) met Tuesday, where they outlined to some degree their plans for the upcoming year.

The group has regular meetings to educate the public about issues such as transportation for the disabled, day care services and institutionalization. The purpose of the group, as summed up by Chairperson Mary Alice McQuade, is "to represent the concerns and interests of people with physical and mental disabilities in the state."

McQuade said she liked the fact that "It's a way to see people in an other than therapy-type session." She said she did not want it to sound like a clinical kind of group.

Clifford Junkins, Jr., a member of the committee, said he saw a problem of too many agencies all trying to accomplish the same things, which caused confusion. He was especially concerned that the money coming from the federal level has to stop and be drawn from at so many places. By the time it reaches the local level hardly anything is left, he said.

Junkins and his wife, who was also at the meeting, have a son who is in a community home because he is retarded.

The group has been at least partially responsible for the recent enactment of the Universal Health Care Law, which provides supplemental health care not already covered by health insurance, and the Turning 22 Law which assists the transition of severely disabled youth, not eligible for special education and not capable of working, into adult services.

Katy Flory, a volunteer worker for the group, said the feeling she gets from the public is the group is like a board, because it is closed to "non-members." She said she hopes this feeling will change, because the Advisory Committee welcomes anyone to come and sit in on their meetings.

McQuade said she would love for students at any of the colleges in the area to come to the meetings because it would give their committee a chance to hear specific views from younger people regarding developmental disabilities. She said she feels strongly that students be involved, because it is a problem everyone should recognize.

The group has been meeting every month between September and June for five years.

The organization functions also to be a direct link between the families with developmental disabilities in Western Mass and the MDDC, creating forums for discussions between legislators and these families. In addition, they aid the MDDC in lobbying for bills in congress.

The committee meets the fourth Tuesday of every month, currently in the Office for Children, 26 Market street, Northampton. This location may change soon, however, and it would be best if anyone interested contact McQuade.

Presidential campaign rolls on; Bush in lead

Bush leads polls

NEW YORK (AP) — Republican George Bush, benefitting from general satisfaction with the state of the country, leads Democrat Michael Dukakis 48 to 41 percent in the race for the presidency, according to a new Time magazine opinion poll.

Bush's margin was one percentage wider than the lead he held in a similar Time national survey in August and it was a few percentage points more than other national polls have given the GOP nominee in recent weeks.

The vice president is leading partly because most of those surveyed are pleased with the state of the country, according to Time. Seventy-three percent of those surveyed said things are going "fairly well or very well," the highest proportion since October 1984.

However, a majority of those polled believe that blacks, the young, the elderly, low-income families and the middle class are worse off under Ronald Reagan.

And 51 percent of those polled said Bush is "avoiding the real issues of the campaign." Only 41 percent said the same of Dukakis.

Forty-seven percent of the respondents believe the choice of Dan Quayle as a running mate reflects unfavorably on Bush's ability to make important presidential decisions.

Asked about the recent debate, voters found Dukakis "more believable" by 40 percent to 39 percent, and also gave Dukakis credit for having a better command of the facts, buy 44 percent to 35 percent.

The poll, conducted by Yankelovich Clancy Shulman, surveyed 1,101 likely voters by telephone Sept. 27-28. The sampling error was estimated at plus or minus 3 percentage points

Dukakis seeks to shed liberal label

HARTFORD, Conn. (AP) — Michael Dukakis sought yesterday to shed the liberal label pasted on his candidacy by Republicans, declaring that George Bush "offers complacency, I offer change...he gives us slogans, we're offering solutions."

Invoking the triumphs of the Olympic Games and the Discovery space shuttle, the Democratic nominee proposed making the United States the champion in world trade and accused Bush of offering "tired and used up ideas" that favor the wealthy and shortchange average Americans.

Dukakis began a two-day campaign swing in the Connecticut capital, meeting with students at an elementary school before addressing a crowded lunchtime rally outside the old statehouse.

He then headed to the Detroit area to watch the burning of confiscated drugs and to a Chicago meeting with black supporters on the city's South Side.

"If you think America should settle for the bronze medal, then you vote for Bush and (Dan) Quayle," a short-sleeved Dukakis told the Hartford rally.

"But if you believe, as I do, that America and Americans should go for the gold - in the classrooms, in the workplace, and in the world economy - then your ticket on Nov. 8 is Mike Dukakis and Lloyd Bentsen."

Alluding to the Discovery's successful space mission, Dukakis said that just as President Kennedy made the decision to send Americans to the moon, the next president would have to restore US leadership in the world marketplace.

"John Kennedy raised the Stars and Stripes until they literally reached the moon," he said. "I want to stamp Stars and Stripes on American products all over the globe."

Raising his voice to be heard over chanting Bush supporters, Dukakis scoffed at what he called the vice president's contention that "everything's fine, not to worry."

"Ask yourself this: Could your children today buy the house they grew up in?" he asked. "Can they pay for a college education without a mountain of debt when they graduate? Is your family really getting ahead, or is it just running in place or even falling behind?"

The Massachusetts governor cited his support for universal health insurance, a college aid program relying on payroll deductions, job training business investment incentives and vigorous enforcements of the trade law.

"Mr. Bush offers complacency; I offer change," Dukakis said. "He gives us slogans; we're offering solutions to the problems that American families face every day and every week and every month." He took a swipe at Bush's repeated allegations that Dukakis is a big-spending liberal in hiding.

"The solutions we're proposing are not big-money solutions or big-government solutions," Dukakis said. "And unlike Mr. Bush's tired old ideas, they won't leave America running in place. They'll make America the most powerful and productive country on earth."

At the Alfred E. Durr Elementary School, Dukakis occasionally spoke in Spanish as he urged pupils to careers in teaching or science. He also took a few questions, which he rarely does with reporters on the campaign trail.

One student asked why he was a Democrat and not a Republican.

"I'm a Democrat because I think Democrats and the Democratic Party are committed to helping people to live better lives.

"I don't want a lot of hype. I just want something I can count on."

Greg Riley-University of North Carolina-Class of 1989

Training flight crash in Florida injures one navy pilot

WHITING FIELD, Fla. (AP) — An instructor pilot suffered a minor skull fracture when his Navy training plane crashed into a forest on a post-maintenance check flight yesterday, a Navy spokeswoman said. The $1 million T-34C Turbo Mentor was heavily damaged when it went down in Blackwater River State Forest at 9:35 a.m. CDT about five miles northeast of this naval air station in the Florida Panhandle, said Ensign Erica Smith.

The single-engine, turboprop plane apparently had some kind of engine malfunction, but it was too early to pin down the exact cause, Ms. Smith said yesterday.

Navy Lt. Michael Kiley, 29, a Pensacola resident originally from Boston, was trying to make a forced landing after losing power and may have been heading for a nearby field, she said. But the aircraft hit trees and struck the ground nose-first. He was the only person aboard the two-seat aircraft.

The plane had just undergone maintenance that included engine work, but investigators weren't able to immediately determine whether those repairs figured into the crash, she said.

Mrs. Smith said the maintenance could be checked while flying.

Kiley was flown by helicopter to West Florida Regional Medical Center in Pensacola, Ms. Smith said. He was expected to be released yesterday evening or today.

Whiting, about 30 miles northeast of Pensacola, is the Navy's busiest air station. It is a training base for primary flight instruction in T-34C's. All Navy helicopter flight training is also conducted here.

Student pays bills with pumpkins

By JEN McKINNEY
Collegian Correspondent

"Oh, they're so cute."

This is the most common reaction people have when they approach senior Ken Ruggiero's vending table on the Campus Center concourse. He is selling pumpkins, but these are not ordinary pumpkins. Each has its own distinguishing painted-on facial expression: happy faces, pirates, and others.

Ruggiero, a 22-year-old accounting major, got the idea from his father, the owner of an ice-cream store in New Jersey, who does this as a sideline when Halloween season rolls around.

The pumpkins seem to be popular among campus secretaries, who buy them to brighten up the office with their comical faces, he said.

Adrian Oullet, who said he was a satisfied customer, was going to buy his granddaughter a plain pumpkin, but when he saw these characters, he could not resist, he said.

People passing by yesterday grinned and chuckled upon seeing the gourds. Many like to come up and touch them, under the impression that the pumpkins are plastic or ceramic because of the shiny paint, Ruggiero said. But he is quick to point out that these are genuine pumpkins, which he gets from a farm in North Hadley.

He intends to personalize and customize the fruit to customers' tastes, he said.

They are $4 each, and he said the money will go toward his tuition. They will be on sale in the concourse today and tomorrow and Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday for the next two weeks.

Winners and everyone else

Remember Walter Mondale? The man who ran for president four years ago?

If you do, you may see him as a failure, a loser, a flop.

Remember the 1986 Red Sox? Remember Bill Buckner?

If you do, you may think they bit the dust, succumbed, buckled, or laid an egg.

Why do we have so many ways to say someone tried but nonetheless was not number one?

Author Harold Kushner once said that America "brands 95 percent of society as losers. We all have dreams, most of which do not come true."

David R. Mark

We define success as being the best — whether it be the smartest, the best looking, or the most athletic.

But not everyone is Albert Einstein. I think I'm an able student, but I'm far from the first in my class, let alone the best in the country.

But one thing I can say honestly is I try. I may not be the best, but if I push myself, there's a good chance I'll be happy with the result — be it a 4.0, a 3.0, or a 2.0. If I know I gave my best effort, who cares what everyone else does?

Not everyone has a face like Christie Brinkley, a body like Arnold Schwarzenegger, or the ability of Roger Clemens. It doesn't mean we can't try to look our best, stay in our best shape, or do our best.

The Red Sox are again in the playoffs. Tomorrow they begin their October odyssey toward possible success. If they win, all the better for Sox fans.

But if they lose, which is more likely (they have a one in four chance of being the World Series champions), then how will I react?

Sure, I'll be just as upset as the next fan. But I'll try to remember that in order to be in the playoffs, they were much more than a 'bunch of losers.'

And even if the loss is as upsetting as their 1986 defeat, I won't wish death upon some unfortunate ball player.

Everyone makes mistakes. No matter how hard we try, we're not perfect. Too often we are told we're 'just like' someone else. We may even try to be just like that someone. But if we try to copy someone else's 'perfection,' instead of each trying to be the best me, we're not better people, we're better mimics.

Another point, via Kushner: "For those whose dreams do come true, for those who do win, there is the thought, 'is this what I worked for? Was it worth effort?' Some people finish so far ahead that they are not happy, they're lonely."

Sometimes looking out for number one has its disadvantages. I'd rather be part of a team than be the leader of a one-man team.

It's important to remember that to play major league baseball, to run for president, or even to be in college, you have to have someone special.

Not everyone can be the best, but everyone can be someone special.

Columnist should have checked facts on Greek slogans

In response to a Nancy Klingener's column ("Amherst priority and un-Smith parties," Sept. 30), I was surprised and disappointed that such an experienced and unbiased, campus-known journalist would dare to print an untruth or bother to forget to research and support facts that would libel organizations.

"Greeks . . . The Choice of a New Generation," has been the selected sorority rush slogan for almost a year now. It is not a 'recent' idea. Get with it. Our slogan is not and never was, "The Choice of a New Generation." That was Pepsi's idea. Speaking of Pepsi, the beverage corporation is sponsoring and funding almost half of the cost of the sorority's rush advertisements that appeared in the Collegian for two days, and on bulletin boards in the form of printed fliers. Clearly you had no sources in finding the facts to this act of 'plagiarism.' The Panhellenic Council made all of this information accessible by supplying the Collegian with their own personal copies of our rush dates and fliers with Pepsi's logo in the bottom left corner, clearly indicating this corporation as our sponsor.

I applaud you on your comment that the "best way to deal with stereotypes is to mock them. . ." Practice what you preach. De-mythologize your "animal house" conception of the Greek Area once and for all and concentrate your efforts on the activities sponsored by the largest RSO on campus — the fraternities and sororities that comprise the Greek Area.

Over 600 Greeks went underground and got filthy dirty (like 'animals') this weekend, planting flowers bulbs to beautify this campus. We sponsor blood drives, voter registration with the Chancellor, workshops, and raise thousands of dollars for philanthrophies while maintaining a combined grade point average higher than that of non-Greeks. Where were you when over 100 Greeks were running back and forth between cars and the 22nd floor of the Southwest towers, Sunday, Sept. 4, with refrigerators and stereos in an effort to make freshman move-in day as quick and easy as possible? It was a miserable, rainy day to top it all off.

Please, in the future, check the facts, back up your information, quote correctly and stop being so hypocritical. Life is dreary enough without always having to hear the negative.

'Student leaders' must fight station

I am in outrage at the decision to put the so-called police sub-station in Washington Tower and the apparent support of it by SGA co-presidents-elect Shari Silkoff and Jason Rabinowitz.

It is clear that this is nothing more than an attempt by the administration to set up a beach-head in the Southwest Residential Area to support their repression of student rights. The main argument of the administrators is that this would create better relations between police and students and would be an educational program.

They resort to the lame excuse of convenience to justify it's location in a residential building rather than in a non-residential building. Any attmept to provide education outside the academic realm by administration must be examined and criticized. The Residential Education boondoggle is an example of how the administration represses students and wastes money under the name of education.

At issue is not the motivation of the administration, who've proven countless times they're disregard for students.

The issue is the apparent support from so-called 'student leaders' Silkoff and Rabinowitz, both of whom met with the administrators to discuss the issue.

It's a good thing Silkoff and Rabinowitz have been found unconstitutional to serve by the Student Supreme Court, since their behavior shows they're not fit and qualified to advocate on behalf of students.

The fundamentals of life

Discovering what is reality

Newer and hopefully more improved version.

When I was a lad it seemed to me there were three possible ways to discover truth and reality: the occult, the Bible and science. I embraced all three. It wasn't easy; I was constantly trying to reconcile them: evolution and creation, ancient and modern, eternal judgment and value-free spiritual planes.

Rusty Denton

After several years I abandoned the occult. It wasn't because of science; some mysteries are beyond science. And there is power in the occult; I used that power as did others in my family. No, I quit my pagan ways because I couldn't find a way around the Bible's condemnation of every sort of otherworldly exercise. It was either the Bible or the witchcraft and I already trusted scripture because of a personal experience with Jesus Christ.

Without that encounter with Jesus I could have gone the other way, obviously, but it would still have been a religious choice. Those in the New Age movement pray to whatever is out there, put faith in horoscopes, crystals and divining rods, and teach about the spiritual nature of humanity and the universe.

Occultism is a selfish religion, trying to get something for nothing with mystical abilities. There's nothing altruistic about it, and there's no such thing as white magic. Occult activity is like a cocaine high because it makes people feel they can do anything. The drug analogy fits; ancient definitions of sorcery mention entering the spirit world in a drug-induced trance.

Those of us with experience in exorcism (we prefer the term deliverance ministry) find that people who have been active in the occult are very often demonized even after they've left their satanic mysticism. These demonic personalities take up quiet residence in people, causing fearfullness or irrationality or sleeplessness or voices no one eles hears.

In deliverance demons manifest themselves visibly and audibly as they are expelled by Jesus' authority. Science may have names for their effects — schizophrenia or neurosis or psychosis — but science is remarkably helpless to heal them. I've seen deliverance and Christian inner healing do in days what mental health professionals had failed to do in years. I've also seen people make their problems worse by an occult method like hypnosis.

I don't apologize for my unscientific vein here. I consider myself a scientist, but science can't explain how my sister was miraculously healed in Jesus' name of a lethal form of asthma. It can't explain how my brother was likewise healed of cerebral palsy. Science does not have the last word. Those who think it does have practically made science a religion in America.

That brings us back to the three choices I saw for determining what reality is: the occult, the Bible and science. My decision is made, but I think the same choices await most Americans today. Sadly, I don't think many of us have really thought through why we believe what we do. We're mindlessly drifting along, letting the prevailing philosophical winds carry us where they may, as though finding the truth doesn't matter. It does.

Council member loses bid to change ballot

BOSTON (AP) — Executive Council member Herbert Connolly, whose own vote could have given him a tie in his re-election primary, learned yesterday that a missing absentee ballot was found in Brookline town hall.

The 20-year veteran of the obscure state office failed to win a Supreme Court injunction yesterday that would have stopped the printing of ballots for the November general election, which were sent to the printer at 5 p.m. bearing the name of Connolly's rival, Lowell City Councilor Robert B. Kennedy.

But Connolly won an expedited hearing in Superior Court, and he planned to seek relief in Suffolk County on Tuesday.

Connolly is represented by state Rep. William Galvin, the former House chairman of the Legislature's committee on Election Laws, who said he was told late Monday that Brookline officials acknowledged the existence of the still-sealed ballot.

"They don't want to touch it until ordered by a court," Galvin said. "But I will certainly seek to introduce the 'whodunit' ballot."

By his own admission, Connolly was late getting to the polls on Sept. 15 and failed to cast a vote for himself on the Democratic primary.

So it was his own fault when a recount showed that Connolly had lost the Democratic nomination for a seat on the Executive Council by just one vote.

The recount showed Connolly with 14,715 votes. His opponent got 14,716.

The 67-year-old car dealer said he had been campaigning in the neighboring city of Waltham on election day, "and I waited until the last minute to race over" to vote.

The eight-member Governor's Council, which dates from the Colonial era, lost many of its powers in the 1960's. Its chief remaining duties are to approve criminal pardons and confirm judges nominated by Gov. Michael S. Dukakis.

Connolly, who has been a member of the council since 1969, is continuing to protest the election, even though two Supreme Court judges excused themselves yesterday and a third, Justice Herbert Wilkins, declined to issue a preliminary injunction.

At 5 p.m., Secretary of State Michael Connolly who is no relation to the candidate, ordered the November ballot printed with Kennedy rather than Connolly as the Democratic candidate.

Deputy said Connolly had no choice under the state's printing contract.

Candidate Connolly did get one break yesterday, however. The state Ballot Law Commission rejected a challenge by a Republican candidate for the Governor's Council, Jody Dow of Brookline.

Dow, seeking to keep Connolly off the November ballot no matter who was declared the Democratic primary winner, argued that Connolly really lives in Framingham, outside the council district. But the commission, without comment, disagreed.

Kennedy, who is no relation to the famous political family, said he "won the election fair and square" and could see little point in a special election, which would cost the taxpayers thousands of dollars.

"All another election would do at this point would be to give my opponent an opportunity to vote," Kennedy said.

In any event, failing to vote was not Connolly's only blunder. Shortly before the primary, he placed a newspaper advertisement urging his supporters to get to the polls on Sept. 14. The election was Sept. 15.

"It's a nightmare," Galvin observed at mid-afternoon yesterday, still seeking a court hearing.

"HOW I MADE $18,000 FOR COLLEGE BY WORKING WEEKENDS."

As soon as I finished Advanced Training, the Guard gave me a cash bonus of $2,000. I'm also getting another $5,000 for tuition and books, thanks to the New GI Bill.

Not to mention my monthly Army Guard paychecks. They'll add up to more than $11,000 over the six years I'm in the Guard.

And if I take out a college loan, the Guard will help me pay it back—up to $1,500 a year, plus interest.

It all adds up to $18,000—or more—for college for just a little of my time. And that's a heck of a better deal than any car wash will give you.

THE GUARD CAN HELP PUT YOU THROUGH COLLEGE, TOO. SEE YOUR LOCAL RECRUITER FOR DETAILS, CALL TOLL-FREE 800-638-7600,* OR MAIL THIS COUPON.

When my friends and I graduated from high school, we all took part-time jobs to pay for college.

They ended up in car washes and hamburger joints, putting in long hours for little pay.

Not me. My job takes just one weekend a month and two weeks a year. Yet, I'm earning $18,000 for college.

Because I joined my local Army National Guard.

They're the people who help our state during emergencies like hurricanes and floods. They're also an important part of our country's military defense.

So, since I'm helping them do such an important job, they're helping me make it through school.

Duran dreadful; Satellites stale; Fordham is fab

By CHRIS A. MUTHER

The Singles Scene

Duran Duran "I Don't Want Your Love"
A few years ago, a new release from Duran Duran would cause quite a stir. These days, it just causes a few cringes, and with good reason. They have locked themselves into a pattern of white "funk" that just doesn't work. Simon LeBon's irritating voice, in addition to the Andy Taylor-esque gutiar solo and the unimaginative lyrics, makes for a dreadful listening experience.

Giant Steps "The World Don't Need Another Lover"/Sa-Phire "Boy, I've Been Told"
These two songs have a lot in common. They're both very up, bouncy and fun to listen to. They also lack substance, something which seems to be happening frequently these days in dance music. We don't want to hear all the world's problems while we dance, just some originality.

Pet Shop Boys "Domino Dancing"
Disco: who would have ever thought it would return with such vitality? Like it or not, the undisputed kings of this new wave have returned. A new twist has been added with "Domino Dancing": a slightly Latin flavor, thanks in part to Miami Sound Machine producer Lewis A. Martinee. If you can stand Neil Tennant's talk-sing style, then "Domino Dancing" will definitely appeal to you.

Georgia Satellites "Hippy Hippy Shake"
This song wins the prize for unoriginality. The song is actually very good; in fact, if any band that covered it stayed close to the original version, they could easily have a hit. The Georgia Satellites stay a little too close to the original, bringing nothing unique to the song. If you like it, buy the old record.

George Michael "Kissing a Fool"
George, we all know you have the Midas touch. Is it necessary to release every song off your album? "Kissing a Fool" is a Forties-style ballad that your parents will probably like a lot more than you will. I think it's time for a new album, George.

Julia Fordham "Happy Ever After"
If you're into obnoxious, loud and aggressive music, this song is not for you. Singing almost a cappella to a drum beat, Fordham's voice is put on a pedestal — and it belongs there. Her smooth, clear vocal style could be compared to Annie Lennox or Basia. The song itself reveals a direct African influence and the result is inspired.

Level 42 "Heaven in My Hands"
After a change in the line-up last year, Level 42 has returned with a new sound. Any Level 42 song is worth listening to just to hear lead singer Mark King's bass playing, but fortunately we have other reasons to listen. Keeping their original funk style they've also added a heavier guitar and more prominent drums — a change for the better.

Jazz pianist Ray Charles will appear at the University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Center Concert Hall on Thursday, Oct. 6 at 8 p.m. Billed as the "Ray Charles Show '88," the evening's line up will include the Raelettes, the 7 piece Ray Charles Orchestra, plus special guest jazz violinist Leroy Jenkins and his group Sting. (See page 10).

In his more than forty years as a professional musician, Ray Charles has been awarded countless honors for his artistic, as well as humanitarian acheivements. In 1985, he was one of the participants in the historic "We Are The World" recording to benefit USA for Africa. His recordings have won a total of ten Grammy Awards. His music is marked by the unpredictability that is the genius of consummate artistry.

Violinist/composer Leroy Jenkins is continually inventing his own language it music. His is an extraordinary bonding of a variety of sounds associated with the black music tradition, while simultaneously bridging with European styles. He group Sting is a sextet comprised of two violins, two guitars, bass and drums.

Tickets for the show are available at the Fine Arts Center Box Office for $25, $23 and $21. For more information call 545-2511.

Where musicians can play around the Valley

By ROB SKELTON
Collegian Correspondent

For the aspiring musician, a question to ponder is "Where to play?" Here's a rundown of potential venues for the hungry performer.

The Pioneer Valley Folklore Society sponsors an open microphone evening the first Wednesday of every month at the Iron Horse in Northampton. Show up promptly at 7:30 p.m. and you'll get a chance to sign up for fifteen minutes or three songs, whichever comes first. The audience here seems to be the best around because it appreciates the great talent that emerges. It's also sympathetic to the nervous newcomer.

Tuesdays at L'Oasis, from 9 p.m. to closing, is Open Blues Jam. Bring your instrument and sign up with host Blue Bill, from WMUA. Since the blues is a fairly common musical language, musicians get thrown together, and it's usually great fun. Singers and horn players are especially encouraged.

Wednesdays at L'Oasis is the band showcase night, which is a chance for bands to test their material in a non-threatening atmosphere. Bring a tape to L'Oasis.

Bonducci's in Northampton recently started a poetry/music forum on Mondays and Wednesdays, 7-9 p.m. Sign-ups for the program on Mondays is at 6:30 p.m. or by prior arrangement. The Wednesday programs are used to showcase one or two particular artists. The poetry and music sounds good over the PA system, so if you're interested, call for more information.

The Northampton Center for the Arts occasionally provides a forum for local musicians. Located in a renovated middle school on South Street, the Center will help local performers showcase music in numerous ways, including publicity. All of this must be arranged by contacting them

The "Afternoon Alternative" at Davis Hall at Smith College is a Saturday afternoon acoustic forum sponsored by the Smith Recreation Council, which also runs "Thursday Night Club." The atmosphere is casual, although sometimes the Smithies are too involved with their whatever to take much notice. However, unlike most of the above-mentioned gigs, this pays money. Also at Smith is Sophie's Place, a student-run coffeehouse which features occasional live performers, usually on Wednesday nights. This place is nice.

The Soup Kitchen in Northampton sometimes has musicians performing. Talk to the management and bring a tape or press kit.

LOCAL VOCAL

These look familiar? Well, if you read the classifieds in the Collegian, or any other local paper, or if you've ever been to a bus stop in Amherst, they should. Hopeful bands constantly advertise in order to fill the gaps which keep them in the garage, and while most will agree that good bass players are the toughest item to come by, it's no secret that everyone plays guitar.

It's a rare occasion to find an ad requesting the services of a lead guitarist; most likely because it's usually guitarists who get the notion to start a band. Traditionally, it's the guitarist who is the musical director, and his visions are the creative basis for the group's music. Even cover bands, which make up a good portion of the UMass scene, are usually founded by some strung-out Zep head who's dying to show off his chops.

Guitarists, good and bad, are everywhere. Stay tuned and you'll probably find out who's the best.

Speaking of guitarists, Bad Grades is the newest UMass band to feature the favored, blistering six string format we know so well. Keep an eye (and an ear) out, and look for an upcoming feature.

For the few people (maybe 10 or 15) who were still down in the Hatch at around 12:30 Thursday night, it was an amusing treat to see the Godfathers,fresh from their gig in the Student Union Ballroom, hop on stage for an ode to the Beastie Boys. A nice ending to the un-advertised Split Decision show.

Who's made good? Grave Goods. A nice sound, a record deal, and an already sizeable following. With two bandmembers from UMass, they deserve congratulations for their increasing success.

If you've got a band, let the world know. Send any information to: Local Vocal. Collegian Arts Desk. 113 Campus Center, or call the Collegian, 545-3500, and ask for the Arts department.

Violinist/composer Leroy Jenkins plays with Ray Charles Thursday at the Fine Arts Center at 8 p.m.

Marge Piercy celebrates the Jewish New Year tomorrow night with selected readings from her books of poetry and fiction. She will speak in Campus Center room 917 at 7:30 p.m.

What about Amherst? Unfortunately, there are few places in town which carry live music. There are so many colleges with different goings-on that it probably doesn't matter much. Last Friday's outdoor show at the Carriage Shops, with Grave Goods and Gidgette Goes to Hell, was a successful effort by Modrian Clothing Store against all odds, such as poor weather and community apathy. Hopefully there will be more of these independently-produced shows.

Amherst College has Marsh House, which has great parties featuring bands like the Vestrymen and Cordelia's Dad. Additionally, Amherst budgets lots of money for parties, which naturally includes the hiring of bands. Smith and Mount Holyoke Colleges are good in this regard also.

In nice weather it is possible to reserve Amherst Common for musical events. Iron Elf, One Seed and numerous other local bands have played there. Also, the Amherst Unitarian Church can be rented out for shows and benefits and fundraisers. It's been used for burning shows by Zydeco Future and Liquid Lesson.

Next week: places to play at UMASS

Missing Cat's Hatch show proves that more is missing

Missing Cat, a Brookline based duo, played at the Student Union Hatch Friday night to a large and varied crowd. Their brand of moody folk music sprinkled with blues was reminiscent of Simon and Garfunkel.

Their set consisted of both original material and a wide assortment of cover versions ranging from Ben E. King's "Stand By Me" to Guns 'N Roses "Sweet Child 'O Mine."

Although both band members Ari Vais and John Martranga are talented guitrists, their song writing capabilites are crude and limited. The duo did best with cover versions.

Another weakness of the duo is voice strength. Neither of the two have a voice suited for loud songs or high notes. The band did much better with softer songs and harmonizing.

But in the end, these cats are sorely missing a few key elements in their act.

The doors to the chapel inside the Newman Center

"UMass is about to explode!"

So recalls the Reverend Joseph Quigley, director of the Newman Center, as it was expressed nearly forty years ago by the late Rev. David J. Power, who ran the center until 1973.

The comment was made in a conversation Power was having with the late Bishop Christopher J. Weldon of the Springfield Archdiocese regarding how much the University would grow as a result of the end of WW II and the institution of the GI bill of Rights. One of the benefits the GI Bill provided was free tuition to state colleges, which, as predicted by Power, resulted in "tumultuous expansion" of these institutions.

Quigley recounts a proposed plan for at least 25,000 students and the desire for the church to take an active role in student lives.

Opening its doors on April 1, 1963, the Center set out with the intention of becoming a Roman Catholic cultural center.

Indeed, some 2,000 plus students pass daily through the center's doors, seeking a quiet spot to study, pray, talk; or else they can descend to the cafeteria, said Christopher Mascarenhas, the Newman Student Association president.

Although it was intended to be a common ground for Catholic students, it has become much more, said Quigley: "It has become an ecumenical Center." Services of different denominations take place in one of the two lounges. Prayer groups, Alcoholics Anonymous, Overeaters Anonymous and several other groups gather at the center. It becomes a safe, "homey place to go," Mascarenhas said.

Two philosophies reared their heads as the center was introduced, Quigley said. "The first was that you shouldn't have a fixed place; spread yourself over the campus, dining halls, dorms, sort of a travelling minstrel. The next was that you should have a fixed place where people can seek you out." And thus far it appears the second theory has proven itself true.

Part of the Newman Center since its conception, Quigley sees one of the greatest accomplishments as actually "clearing the land to set up the log cabin."

Because of the separation of church and state, the funding had to originate from the church, so Weldon invested $1.5 million to erect the structure. To continue self-generating funds, a phone-a-thon began yesterday and will run until October 20. When the chapel was being built,

Newman assets: Baybanks to burgers

What'll I do for dinner? My roommate is an utter slob. Where's my desk? My roommate is a complete neat-freak. She put my poli-sci books away. Baybanks machines are always attached to long lines. I feel completely desolate.

All of the above concerns can be remedied by facilities at the Newman Center. With a cafeteria that seats 450 people as well as food more reasonably priced than at the Hatch, the dinner dilemma is solved. And its proximity to most of the campus makes it an ideal place to dash in and out for a quick bite or a full meal.

Despite rumors, the Baybanks machines there are not the most-used in the world. There are two, and one does not usually have to wait too long to use them, said Christopher Mascarenhas, president of the Newman Center's Student Association. Three copying machines are also available.

Mascarenhas said although the doors are locked officially at 10 p.m., they are never closed, and the phones are never off the hook. "Someone is always there to talk to or encourage you when you need it."

And for those uninterested in a trek to the library, study rooms are available, also.

a minor controversy occurred over the pews. Weldon only wanted one set of pews put in, so he could see if they were suitable. But the builder, recounts Quigley, perhaps in a "fit of largess" decided to suit the entire chapel with pews.

The Bishop discovered it, and in "he marched with his entourage, lieutenants and all, and me, the low man on the totem pole," said Quigley.

"The Bishop decided he wanted to rip up the pews. And I'm thinking that the longer the building goes on, the longer I'll be going back and forth. [Quigley was splitting his time between St. Bridget's parish in Amherst and the campus ministry at UMass.] So he points to me, of all people and said, 'sit down and tell me what you think.'

So I sat down and all of these things were running through my mind. He asked, 'Well, what does it feel like?' and . . . I said, 'Well, I have to get the feel of it!' Finally I told him it was fine. He didn't think so." So up the pews came and Quigley's travelling was prolonged for a few more weeks. "But the next set of pews were much more comfortable for all of the use they receive now," he said.

Amherst festival showcases early music

AMHERST (AP) — There's a summer place for shawms and curtals, even sackbuts, in this Western Massachusetts college town that for the past 15 years has hosted one of the world's largest festivals of early music.

The festival, held for two weeks in August, had a faculty of 50 this summer and about 200 students, who came from as far away as New Zealand, she said.

"Interest in early music has really been growing over the past several years, and our festival gives people a chance to study and play with some of the leading people in the world," said Valerie Horst, a recorder player from New York City who has served as director of the Amherst festival for the past 11 years.

"It's quite different from playing modern music, you know, because you have to piece everything back together," she said. "The scores don't contain a lot of clues as to how the music was played and it involves a lot of learning apart from musical performance. Next summer, we are considering adding classes on costume making."

"Most of our students are avid amateur musicians who got interested either through friends or by going to a concert and saying 'I want to do that,' " she said. "A lot of schools still teach recorder. We have bookkeepers, chief executive officers, academics, librarians, even a taxi driver."

There are special classes in making wooden Japanese recorders, although the Japanese have become proficient at turning out plastic versions "that have a remarkably good sound and allow people to start out with a small investment," she said.

Many of the older instruments, ranging from the better known harps, lutes and harpsichords to the rarer vielle, an early fiddle that descended from the guitar, are being made again by modern artisans, she said, and are enjoying a renewed popularity in chamber music groups.

But most of the early brasses and double-reeds, such as the krummhorn, a length of curved boxwood with a pierced cap covering the reed, died out and now are found only in specialized orchestras, she said. Every three years, the Amherst school hosts special classes in serpent, a sinuous bass horn that's rare even in museums, she said.

The taxi driver plays the recorder, she said, although he might be more at home with the shawms and curtals, double-reed instruments up to six feet long that could hold their own blasting out an alarum in any midtown traffic jam.

"They sound like a really crass oboe or tortured sheep," she said. "And they are loud. In the 16th century only war and thunder would have been louder. The krummhorn? It really sounds like a sick sheep."

The big double-reeds and early brasses, originally used for military calls to arms and wedding fanfares, are little used now, except for ceremonial fanfares in cathedrals and colleges, she said.

But there were also special days devoted to partisans of the sackbut, an ancestor of the trombone and thee cornetto, which is played like a trumpet, but made of wood with fingerholes.

The dancers were headquartered in fraternity houses. The wood floors of the old fraternity houses are just what they need," she said. "You can do without bars and mirrors, but you can't dance without a wood floor."

And there are even classes in Baroque gesture.

"It's a lost art that's being rediscovered," she said. "In those days, they wouldn't have just stood up and sang. They used their hands to convey certain specific meanings and shades of meaning."

"It adds a whole new dimension to the performance, just as the way the costumes are sewn affect the dancers' movements," she said. "To just stand there is as inappropriate as trying to imitate Elvis without wiggling a muscle."

Furlough enrollee held for assault

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP) — A state prison inmate accused of attacking a woman while on furlough from a Boston halfway house was ordered held on $500,000 bail yesterday after pleading innocent to assault charges.

Isaac Aycox, 37, of Springfield pleaded innocent before District Judge Peter J. Rutherford to charges of assault and battery, armed breaking and entering, malicious damage and threatening to murder his former girlfriend at her Springfield apartment.

He also pleaded innocent to charges of assault and battery on a police officer and attempting to steal a police cruiser while at police headquarters, authorities said.

Immediately following the arraignment, Aycox, who had been serving concurrent terms for armed robbery and assault, was returned to state prison, said Hampden County District Attorney Matthew J. Ryan, Jr.

An angry Ryan said he planned to present the case to a grand jury as soon as possible in an attempt to forestall further releases.

"We have some serious problems with the prison furlough program," Ryan said after the arraignment. "The police are even more upset than we are and the victims can't understand what is going on."

He said it was the third time within the past year that a prisoner from Hampden County has been arrested while on a furlough or on an early release program.

State trooper trainers hand over jobs

AGAWAM, Mass. (AP) — Two state troopers in charge of police academy training that apparently put 16 cadets in the hospital turned their jobs over to another set of troopers Monday.

Troopers Charles Blake Gilmore of Deerfield and John M. Richardson of Greenfield handed over the reigns of the physical training program at the Western Massachusetts police academy to state police Lt. William J. Shea of Leeds and Trooper James Ryan of Northampton.

Shea is a 21-year state police veteran with a master's degree in criminal justice and Ryan is a former physical education teacher who has spent the last five years in the Northampton state police barracks, said Jeff Grossman of the state Department of Public Safety.

Gilmore and Richardson "will be returning to the state police academy in Framingham for new assignments," Grossman said. "They will not have further contact with the class."

The changeover took place at the National Guard Armory in Agawam, where classes have been held since the Agawam police academy closed on Sept. 21 for investigation. Gilmore and Richardson asked to be reassigned Friday because of the attention the academy has received since their class was hit by an epidemic two weeks ago.

One cadet, Timothy Shepard, 25, remained in a coma at a Pittsburgh hospital Monday for the 14th day since he collapsed since the first day of training. Fifteen other cadets were later hospitalized when they reported to doctors on their own or on orders of the troopers.

Synod sees gun control, capitol punishment as important issues

BOSTON (AP) — Gun control and capital punishment deserve as much attention as the abortion issue, according to several members of a Catholic synod that also urged parents to send their children to Catholic schools.

The synod's mission statements developed by the 200 clergy, religious sisters and lay people set organizational goals for the Boston archdiocese, the fourth-largest Roman Catholic in the country.

While the delegates gave the general support to a statement asking the archdiocese and Catholics to spend more money to keep schools open, many delegates said they were disappointed that abortion was given special emphasis and capital punishment and gun control were not mentioned.

"We should emphasize that all these are issues of peace and justice," said the Rev. Dennis J. Burns of St. Raphael Parish in Medford.

He objected to editorials in the Pilot, the archdiocesan newspaper, and to literature mailed to priests that appeared to give support to "one national political party and one individual candidate."

He drew applause when he said a presidential candidate's stand on abortion does not necessarily outweigh his record on fair housing, minimum wage and other issues.

The Rev. George F. Carlson, director of continuing education programs for the archdiocese, urged that the anti-abortion statement "address child abuse and domestic violence, capital punishment and teen-age suicide."

The Rev. John F. Mullloy, archdiocesan secretary for pastoral services, said the synod's statement on anti-abortion activities "represents pro-life people talking to pro-life people" and does not "get the message out to others."

Cardinal Bernard F. Law, archbishop of Boston, said he identified "with those who would like to see other issues dealt within the synod," but "it would be very strange if there were not a separate document on this issue since there has hardly been another organization in this society that has dealt with abortion as forcefully as the Catholic Church.

Third-grader shot

MASCOTTE, Fla. (AP) — A gunman in a camouflage outfit shot a third-grade student on a elementary school playground yesterday, authorities said. The girl was reported in stable condition with arm and leg injuries.

The entire police force rushed to Mascotte Elementary School in this small central Florida community, searching for the man who was still at large, said police dispatcher Cathy England.

The gunman shot the girl just before 11 a.m. as she played on the school's physical education field, said Betty June Cofield, secretary to the Lake County school superintendent. No one else was hurt in the incident, and she said she did not know how many shots were fired or what kind of weapon was used.

The wounded girl was Leah Wilbanks, 9, of Mascotte, said Jean Lowe of Orlando Regional Medical Center.

Mascotte is a town of 1,100.

UMass water polo wins 1 of 3

By DENNIS MADSEN
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's water polo team roared into the upper bracket of the Eastern Invitationals this weekend looking to improve over last weekend's beating at the hands of the California powerhouses.

They ended up dropping two of three games but the difficulty of the competition could leave them ranked as high as No. 9 in the East.

The first game was against Brown, the home team which was ranked No. 9 nationally and No. 1 in the East.

"We played out best water polo of the year in that game," UMass coach Russ Yarworth said. "They started off leaving three or four of their best players out but when we came on strong they put them in."

Brown was just too tough, however, and beat UMass 11-10.

Next up was Army, ranked No. 20 nationally, but a different UMass team showed up for that match.

"Our defense was really good," Yarworth said. "But our shooting was off all game."

UMass ended up 5-for-21 shooting, not enough to beat a nationally ranked team, and lost 10-5.

In the final game Sunday they played the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, which they had beaten earlier in the season.

"We came in wanting to blow them away," Yarworth said.

And in the beginning, they did. UMass took an early 5-1 lead but then watched M.I.T. tie it, 5-5. The Minutemen then pulled away again, but M.I.T. stormed back.

It seesawed like that through the entire match and, in the end, UMass needed overtime to win 16-14.

Yarworth was pleased with the team's progress this weekend in that they could win without playing all out. But he did see some weaknesses.

"We didn't concentrate for a full four quarters," Yarworth said. "This is the type of stuff that just comes from experience and playing in practice."

The defense was a bright spot, though, as Jon Miller and Brian McIver contributed six and seven blocks, respectively, over the weekend. Matt Katz added two blocks and Matt Buckley showed a "good commitment to defense," according to Yarworth.

This weekend the team heads east to Boston with a 4-6 record, starting off Friday night with a very big game against Harvard.

"Last year we lost two games to them, each by one point," Yarworth said. "I know we can beat them [this weekend]. It just depends on which [UMass] team shows up."

Saturday UMass plays Amherst and Williams at M.I.T. With some tough play, the Minutemen look to come out of the weekend with three more victories.

"They just have to realize as a team they win together and fall together," Yarworth said.

■ Minutemen ranked No. 11

As far as the Yankee Conference goes, UMass is tied with Villanova for first place. Both teams are 2-0.

Other Yankee Conference teams ranked in the top 20 are the University of Connecticut, 3-1, which climbed from No. 16 to No. 14 this week, and the University of New Hampshire, 3-1, which dropped from a tie for No. 4 down to a tie for No. 19.

average of 0.89 and a save percentage of .900.

One of the problems for the Minutewomen is that the fatigue of this past weekend's action could really take its toll. UMass has to make sure not to waste too much energy early, because UNH is a dominant second half team. Of the 18 goals they've scored this year, 14 have come after intermission.

"They are definitely a second half side," Rudy said. "That's a major concern for me because of our fatigue."

UMass is bruised and battered from the pair of games this week?????? Though the AstroTurf had a lot to do with it, the never-ending travel factored in just as much.

"I'm glad to finally get rid of this," Rudy said, throwing away the itinerary from this weekend.

Sidelines: Fifth-ranked UMass more than likely will move up in the latest national poll, which will be released today. Connecticut, the fourth ranked team, lost a pair of games this weekend to Barry University and Rudy's old school, the University of Central Florida.

If the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team wants to find itself playing for the Atlantic 10 title and an automatic berth in the NCAA's at the end of the season, here's what they have to do.

First, the Minutemen must try and beat every team that appears on what's left of their regular season schedule, starting with tonight's contest at Brown University (7:30), and paying extra attention to the two remaining A-10 contests with Rhode Island and Rutgers.

Then, if the Minutemen do improve on their 5-4 overall record (1-1 in the Atlantic 10 East and 2-1 in the division overall), and fail to win their half of the conference outright and thus qualify automatically for the A-10 tournament, UMass will still have a prayer of landing an at-large bid to the party.

"We know where we stand and what we have to do," said assistant coach John Martin. "We've got to have a winning record, and play well in the Atlantic 10 . . . and that's very feasible right now."

The last time the Minutemen hit the road after a comfortable homestand, they returned as the victims of three consecutive losses and with a 3-4 record. A pair of wins over West Virginia and Siena in this weekend's Massachusetts Challenge Cup have since tipped the scales in the Minutemen's favor once again. The Minutemen now find themselves headed back into Ivy territory with a healthy team, and some momentum, to face a formidable opponent.

"I think it's time for us to win on the road," said Martin.

The Bruins will pose the same type of test against which the Minutemen fell short last week. Forward Josh Schiller and a host of speedy offensive cohorts play the type of streaky, aggressive soccer that cut up the UMass defense against Dartmouth, Vermont and Yale.

"They are very direct," said Martin, "they play the ball quickly."

Though the Minutemen have embarked on a stretch of seven games in the next 13 days, there are several pairs of fresh legs set to see action against the Bruins. Darren Stone, back from a knee injury, made his UMass debut in the win over Siena, and picked up an assist. Fellow freshman Brett Anthony cracked the starting lineup against West Virginia and scored the winning goal in the second overtime of play.

"We've got little depth now . . . we can rotate players and hopefully keep us strong."

Challenge Cup notebook
Tourney a showcase for UMass

By SAM SILVERSTEIN

It is not the World Cup — the results won't dictate who qualifies for the next Olympics, or this fall's NCAA tournament.

The Massachusetts Challenge Cup tournament is, however, an entertaining annual class reunion for the graduates of coach Jeff Gettler's University of Massachusetts soccer program, and a chance to show friends, family, alumni, recruits and the Northeast soccer community what this team has to offer.

"It's our showcase," explained assistant coach John Martin. "It basically brings together everyone whose been associated with UMass soccer."

Everything went right for Gettler and Co., except for the fact that the Cup will once again spend the year on the other side of Charles, in the trophy case at Boston University.

"The only thing we didn't do was win it," said Gettler.

Free Kicks: Named to the all-tournament team were UMass's own Carl Hanks, Mike McCormick, and Mike Mugavero; Chip Cleave, Carlos Duran and Lee Fraser from Siena; John Keating, Scott Laramie, and Chris Chandler of West Virginia; and Chris Verhagen, Jorge Lapaty, Mike Bertos and MVP Mike Emenalo from the Terriers. . .B.U. is the first team to win two consecutive cups. . . how could Siena goalkeeper Carlos Duran, who allowed five goals in his team's two weekend contests, been tabbed as the netminder for the All-Tournament team? "He was the only one tested," shouted one observer as Duran received the award.

Carl Hanks, who busted out of a scoring drought with a pair of goals and an assist this weekend, waited until tournament time to score his first goal last year as well. Hanks went on to tally five goals and three assists in 1987.

Red Sox' season a soap opera

And now, another exciting episode of "As the Red Sox Turn," the 1988 version.

Early March. The Boston Red Sox, thanks to a blend of young talent and seasoned veterans, are favored by many in spring training to win the American League East.

April 4. Opening Day at Fenway Park against the Detroit Tigers. Roger Clemens faces Jack Morris, and the teams battle through nine innings to a 3-3 deadlock.

Newly-acquired bullpen ace Lee Smith comes in to give up a two-run homer to Alan Trammell. Ballgame. Detroit wins, 5-3.

April 5. The Boston Herald runs a headline for the game story, reading "Wait 'til next year."

In the true spirit of baseball fans in New England, the regular season is less than 24 hours old and already the collective region has given up on its hometown team.

Late April. No one can really sense what is wrong yet. The Sox are not playing up to potential. The team will eventually be riddled with controversy, whether it be an outrageous palimony suit or an unscheduled tag-tam match at a hotel in Cleveland. Regardless, something is amiss somewhere. Everyone has an opinion, and most of them seem to center around manager John McNamara.

May 19. Hall-of-Famer Bobby Doerr has his uniform number (1) retired in pre-game ceremonies. McNamara, who has been wearing it, gives it up and takes number 2. It would turn out to be a symbolic move later on down the line.

July 11. The Sox are stuck in the mud with a 43-42 record, nine games out of first place. McNamara, though, tells all that he is happy with his team's record. The news doesn't set in well with higher management.

July 14. A rainy day, with the Sox preparing to play Kansas City. There will be no game on this night, but the Sox make the headlines anyway. McNamara loses his No. 1 status again, fired as Sox manager. Joe Morgan, a long-time minor league manager, is chosen to take his place.

Though the calendar says otherwise, it's as if the big ball has dropped from the sky in Times Square. The rejuvenated Sox go 19-1 in Morgan's first 20 games, back into the race. "Next year" has come a bit early in Beantown.

July 29. Fenway Park press dining room. Several media members notice that Sox General Manager Lou Gorman is missing from dinner, even though ice cream sundaes are being served for dessert. Gorman never misses dessert. But all week he has been searching for a proven starting pitcher to bolster the stretch run. An hour later, the Sox announce that Gorman has acquired Mike Boddicker from the Baltimore Orioles for Brady Anderson and minor league pitcher Curt Schilling. It turns out to be the cherry on the Sox' sundae, so to speak.

Sept. 5. With a victory in Baltimore, the Red Sox finally live up to their pre-season billing. They arrive in first place. But can they hold it, or will it be another big September stretch run choke for the Bostons?

Sept. 30. The Sox, with a magic number of 1 to clinch, lose 4-2 in Cleveland. Later that night, they gather in a Cleveland bar to watch their fate unfold on the West Coast. Milwaukee, the only team with any hope, is trailing Oakland in the ninth inning, 7-1. Relief pitcher Bob Stanley says, "They've got no problem. They haven't got me in their bullpen." He is right. Oakland wins, and the Sox are AL East champions once again.

Oct. 5. Scenario. The Red Sox begin a drive toward the World Series against the Athletics at Fenway, with Bruce Hurst facing Dave Stewart. Let's just hope that, for once, this soap opera has a happy ending.

UMass is ranked 11th

Aside from staking an early claim in the Yankee Conference, the University of Massachusetts football team has made its presence felt on the national level as well.

Saturday's 44-27 win over Boston University vaulted the Minutemen into a tie for the No. 11 ranking in the nation in this week's Division 1-AA poll.

UMass, 3-1, is tied with Furman University of South Carolina, 4-1. Both schools received 36 points.

It is the first week in the poll for the Minutemen. Furman was 15th last week.

North Texas, 3-1, is ranked No. 1, followed by Western Illinois, Appalachian State, Marshall University and Nevada-Reno.

Lafayette College, Georgia Southern, Idaho, William and Mary, and Western Kentucky round out the top 10.

Women's soccer home to face New Hampshire

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

Today, the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team winds up one of its most grueling weeks in recent memory when it faces the University of New Hampshire at Boyden Field (3 p.m.).

Coining a phrase from the New York Mets — and making a slight alteration, the motto for today's game should be "soccer the way Mother Nature intended it to be." After playing consecutive games on that wonderful innovation known as AstroTurf, the 7-0 Minutewomen return home to host New Hampshire on real grass.

Although there is no place like home, this is no time for the Minutewomen to kick up their feet and relax by the fire. New Hampshire enters as the 16th-ranked team in the country, and features a potent game that could give UMass some problems.

The gist of the offense for the 5-2 Wildcats centers mainly around sophomore forward Diane McLoughlin, who has 19 points this season on 8 goals and 3 assists. McLoughlin is a strong player with a lot of speed, a tough player to catch on the attack.

"McLoughlin has a great deal of speed," said UMass coach Jim Rudy. "She can really take it on. She's actually more dangerous coming inside than going outside. She's very talented."

McLoughlin is complimented in the offense by freshman Mary Beth Sydlowski, who has 4 goals and 3 assists, and freshman midfielder Christie Paige.

"They (UNH) are a lot like Holy Cross, in that they use very little play across the field," Rudy said. "They're a very direct team with two good forwards."

In goal is Janene Tilden, who has posted four shutouts and has a goals against

Nader speaks on activism

By LISA JOHNSON
Collegian Correspondent

Consumer Advocate Ralph Nader told about 400 students last night in Bowker Auditorium to think, to vote and to participate in the world's problems.

"We have to begin becoming active in society," said Nader.

"Our problems, whether national, cosmic, or local should be addressed by citizens.

"There's a big difference between learning how to think and going to school to learn how to get a job," said Nader. "There's a great difference in education and just memorization to regurgitation to vegetation."

Nader first became famous for his 1965 book, Unsafe at Any Speed, which exposed the automobile industry's poor safety levels and forced the recall of millions of vehicles. His latest book, The HeartBreak of America, attacks General Motors, specifically Cadillacs and their decline in safety and performance over the past two decades.

Prior to his speech, Nader said the state of student activism on campuses today was mixed.

"There is a small professional slice of the student body, but since they're not blocking traffic or taking over buildings they're not on the news," he said.

"Many students are becoming career-minded at the expense of letting their minds wander from the humanities and histories into becoming a cog in the wheel at someplace like General Motors or Dupont," he said, adding that these students see their education as being limited to interviews at placement offices.

Nader singled out Question 4 on this year's state ballot as a cause to fight for.

The ballot question would close down two state nuclear power plants, Yankee Atomic in Rowe and Pilgrim Nuclear Power Plant in Plymouth.

"We have to shut down aging, inefficient, nuclear plants and bring in renewable forms of energy and cheaper forms of energy," he said.

Though Nader and MassPIRG, a group he founded, supports Question 4, the Committee For a Constructive Tomorrow is against it, among other Nader issues.

In a statement released today, CFACT said, "He and his organization — MassPIRG — are the chief culprits trying to shut down the Pilgrim and Yankee nuclear power plants. These two facilities are necessary to provide power to millions of Massachusetts residents."

The statement went on to say that if these plants close the state will be affected "by higher unemployment, slower economic growth, and a lower overall standard of living."

CFACT also blasted MassPIRG for accepting money from students through a negative check-off fee on tuition bills. A practice they claim is illegal.

One of the last issues raised by Nader was the need for students to vote.

He said out of 13.5 million voting age students only 23 percent participated in the 1984 presidential election.

Nader also said this is the first presidential election that could have less than 50 percent of the registered voters participating in the election.

The presentation was the first in the Distinguished Visitors Program's fall lecture series.

SGA to discuss election
Bylaw change on agenda

By GEORGE FRANCY
Collegian Staff

"Anything can happen" could be the theme of tonight's Undergraduate Student Senate meeting, as several motions on and off the agenda could generate action in the senate.

The key element is whether the senate decides to act on the issues before it or again delay and table motions for future meetings.

The topics to be discussed could include motions to resolve the problems of the last Student Government Association presidential election, changes in the bylaws concerning open meetings, a referendum question on the police sub-station in Southwest Residential Area, and establishing disabled student appointees to the Senate.

The question of ratifying the election of Shari Silkoff and Jason Rabinowitz as SGA co-presidents was brought up in last week's meeting but was tabled indefinitely, according to Silkoff. She said the question could be brought up tonight or continue to simmer on the back burner.

The SGA Coordinating Committee, which acts as the full Senate over the summer, voted June 9 to allow Silkoff and Rabinowitz to take office in a limited capacity.

This move, in turn, has been questioned by a decision of the Student Supreme Court, which issued an injunction to prevent the co-presidents from holding office May 11. The Court last week issued a decision stating the Coordinating Committee's ratification is not allowed.

Silkoff, however, says the injunction itself is not proper. "You can't put a restraining order on a legislative body," Silkoff said. "That's not proper procedure."

Another possibility at tonight's meeting is an amendment to the bylaws to settle the question of whether co-presidents can hold office. Speaker Robert Fadel said this has top priority.

"I feel that at this point the situation has become so complex that there is no simple solution," Fadel said. "The greater issue is resolving the ambiguity in the constitution bylaws."

PULSE keeping with beat of UMass attitudes with polls

By JANNA SCHOMODY
Collegian Correspondent

If someone calls you on a Wednesday night and poses questions about AIDS, student life, or Add/Drop, you've probably been selected as a respondent for a Project Pulse survey.

The only student opinion polling service for the University of Massachusetts has been gathering data for 16 years for different divisions of the Student Affairs office.

"The purpose of Project Pulse is to provide the University community with timely answers to questions, especially dealing with current issues on campus," said Assistant Director Julie Lam. "What's timely about it is the answers are available within a week," she said.

Lam describes Project Pulse as "the research arm of Student Affairs," which consists of five divisions: Educational Access and Outreach, Academic Support Services, Student Activities, Housing Services, and Health Services.

The project offers 10 surveys a semester. Any campus organization under one of these categories may solicit a proposal, which must be approved by the Student Affairs Research committee.

The poll will then be designed by Lam and Pulse Director Liz Williams. Both Lam and Williams are survey design experts, according to the office.

"After we come up with a draft, we run it by the requesting office for approval. We usually go through several drafts," said the month-long assistant director.

The final check comes from Gary Malaney, Student Affairs Research and Evaluation Office Director. SAREO is the larger research organization of which Project Pulse is only a part.

The completed poll is then entered into the main computer at Whitmore so the 25 "pulsers" can easily collect the data over the phone.

Lam said the service's efficiency has improved since they began storing information on computer. "We used to use OPSCAN sheets, and you know how hard it is to fill in all those little circles," she said.

Results are published in a Pulse Report within a week. Copies and records of past surveys are available at the headquarters in room 229 of the Whitmore Administration building.

The document offers no opinion on the statistics, but according to Lam, the information is used to improve student life.

"Supposedly they take information they get from us and incorporate it into their programs," she said. "For instance, Health Services always wants a survey on how satisfied students are with the care. It's a way of checking-in to see if a change made in service was helpful," she said.

Aside from rating customer satisfaction, said Lam, some divisions want to know how students feel about certain issues.

"I think this is important because on a university campus, issues are really fast moving," she said. "Offices on campus can't really be run effectively unless they know what students are thinking."

Project Pulse is funded by Student Affairs. "It doesn't cost the University much at all," Lam said. "We employ work-study students, who use the telephones and computers in Whitmore. There's no need for extra equipment," she said.

This semester "pulsers" will be scanning the campus for opinions on AIDS, alcohol use, and noise in the residence halls, to name a few. They'll also be calling graduate students for the first time.

Lam said Project Pulse was approached by the Graduate Student Senate to investigate the quality of life of their constituents. "There is a general sense that graduate student's lives are deteriorating," she quoted from the GSS proposal. "We thought it would be a good idea to branch out," she said.

"Wedding" to highlight rally

A group of students at noon today will present a theatrical production representing what they call the marriage of the University of Massachusetts to the military industrial complex.

John Leavitt, a member of the group, said this production is intended to wake up students to what he calls a "tainting" of the University.

The public should be made aware of the relationship between the school and the defense and energy departments since it means an end to free education, Leavitt said. He said programs are being cut to allow for the federal research, and the military is virtually being forced upon the students. Groups like the CIA and Reserve Officers Training Corps are constantly recruiting on campus for their organizations, he said.

Leavitt said he wanted to stress the group did not consider this a left or right issue, but they are definitely against the relationship. Blame for the growth of military industrialism cannot be laid on any one person, but rather on the complacency of the students, and the prospect of large amounts of money becoming available because of the relationship, he said.

Leavitt said students who attend the short production on the Student Union steps will become more aware of the issues at hand.

Dukakis fights for state rights

BOSTON (AP) – In a case pitting Gov. Michael Dukakis against the US Defense Department, the state of Massachusetts argued in a federal appeals court yesterday that governors have the constitutional right to veto National Guard training assignments.

Assistant Attorney General Douglas Wilkins, trying to reverse an unfavorable District Court ruling, told a three-judge panel in the 1st US Circuit if Appeals that the "militia clause" of the US Constitution gives state discretion as to how they train their militias.

In reply, John Bolton, head of the US Justice Department's civil division, said the state's position amounted to a "dagger aimed at the heart of national defense."

Dukakis, who is campaigning for the presidency has denounced policy in Central America as "failed and illegal", withheld his consent when federal authorities ordered 13 public relations specialists from the Massachusetts National Guard to train in Honduras and Panama in May and June.

The governor filed suit on Jan. 29, seeking to block the mission, but the court upheld the authority of federal officials on May 6 on the grounds that National Guard troops are sworn to federal duty as well as state duty.

Dukakis filed his appeal in May, putting himself in the position of supporting states' right to dispute the very power he is seeking as a presidential candidate.

After more than half an hour of oral arguments, the Appeals Court took the case under advisement. Lawyers said it could take months to issue a ruling.

Afterward, Dukakis' Statehouse press secretary, James Dorsey, said Dukakis was trying to uphold a principle endorsed by many governors of both parties.

Asked if the Dukakis campaign was concerned that the governor's position could be used against him in the presidential campaign to portray Dukakis as "soft" on defense, Dorsey shot back: "Who's going to make that argument, Dan Quayle?"

Atlanta police drag an anti-abortion protester from the Atlanta SurgiCenter abortion clinic in downtown Atlanta on Tuesday.

Pro-life protesters arrested

ATLANTA (AP) – Police began arresting anti-abortion activists in front of an Atlanta clinic yesterday, moments after the opening round of what protest organizers say will be a four-day "Siege of Atlanta", got under way.

About 80 demonstrators arrived at a midtown abortion facility about 10:40 a.m., many of them crawling up the street toward the small brick building. When some of them tried to go beyond a temporary fence installed outside the clinic, police began dragging the protesters away toward a waiting bus.

About 30 were arrested in about 15 minutes.

About a mile away, another protest began at another clinic, but there were no immediate arrests. About 60 demonstrators also crawled to the building, where they were surrounded by about 40 police officers.

Earlier, city officials had braced for the expected demonstrations by arresting the protest leader, and filing suit against others, claiming they were engaged in a criminal conspiracy.

About 800 demonstrators, some of whom attended a predawn Mass, assembled yesterday morning at a motel on the edge of town. Protest leaders distributed plastic bags to collect the identification of those who planned to be arrested, so that authorities could not determine their names.

That approach was used during a series of anti-abortion demonstrations in Atlanta this summer.

GSS meets
Allocates funds to RSOs

By THOMAS RODRIGUES
Collegian Staff

The Graduate Student Senate is waging a battle for recognition on many fronts while also fighting to accomplish plans for helping graduate students receive more services.

Last night at an abbreviated meeting, the senate agreed to allocate money from their reserve fund to the Off Campus Housing Office to the tune of $2,500.

The senate also agreed to grant $500 to the New World Theatre for its production of a James Baldwin play and $200 to the Radical Student Union who requested funding for a guest speaker.

"We want to establish some kind of liason between the administration and the students and take up issues such as taxation, tuition waivers and stipends for the teaching assistants researchers and other graduate students at the university," said President of the Graduate Student Senate Gita van Heerden on some of the senate's goals.

Another concern for the senate is their involvement with the University of El Salvador, with whom they are trying to set up an exchange.

"At the University of El Salvador there is no academic freedom," said Vice President Thomas Hutcheson. "We want to increase material aid, community education and faculty and administrative support for El Salvador," he said.

The senate has a heavy interest in the proceedings of Civility Week and is sponsoring a training program for teaching assistants who want to address issues of racism and cultural diversity in their classes. Interested graduates should contact the senate.

Lack of interpreters causes worry for deaf students

By MARIA CRESPO
Collegian Correspondent

There is a lack of interpreters for the hearing-impaired in Massachusetts, and this shortage is affecting the state and the University of Massachusetts.

Paul Appleby, director of Handicapped Student Affairs, said, "There has been a shortage of interpreters in Western Massachusetts for as long as I can remember." The reason is the shortage of qualified persons, he said.

There is presently no formal interpreter training program in Western Massachusetts, he said. There are a few in Eastern Massachusetts, but even with those, the state is not able to keep up with the demands, he said.

It is much more difficult to find interpreters for a college environment than for other areas, Appleby said. The educational interpreting skills required are very demanding, he said. The interpreter needs intense vocabulary and interpreting skills to keep up with classes, especially in lectures, where the discussion is non-stop for 50 to 60 minutes, he said.

UMass has been "... barely able to keep our heads above water in terms of being able to find a sufficient number of interpreters," Appleby said. The priority concern is finding classroom interpreters, he said.

This semester is especially difficult at UMass. The Handicapped Students Affairs office has lost two of its full-time interpreters, one resigning and one on maternity leave. This has cut the office interpreters from four full-time interpreters to two.

However, there are still about twelve part-time interpreters available for the 12 to 15 hearing impaired students using the services (a higher number than the average eight to 12 for the past four to five years).

Finding interpreters for a certain time is very difficult, and "not as simple as taking a number of deaf students you have and coming up with a ratio and figuring you need X amount of interpreters," Appleby said. If classes are spread throughout the day, it makes is much easier to find an interpreter available, he said.

There are some periods where there are as many as eight or nine students in class at the same time, a high amount in any area, he said. These students all require an interpreter, and often times there are none available. Eight or nine interpreters at once is a very high percentage not only at UMass, but in Western Massachusetts itself, he said.

If students are not able to get an interpreter, class notes will be provided for them, he said. They will be provided even with an interpreter, if requested, Appleby said.

The lack of interpreters is often time so great, that Donna Demers, coordinator for Deaf Services, must herself go into the classroom and interpret, he said. The best situation is when two students are in the same class, therefore only one interpreter is needed for both, he said.

Although there is a need for more interpreters, the part-time interpreters available, about 12 to 15, do a great job, Appleby said. "The coordinator for Deaf Services here, Donna Demers, has done a really good job in terms of identifying part-time interpreters on the outside to work for 3, 6, 8, 10 hours a week as their schedules allow," he said.

The problem of recruiting qualified interpreters is not prevalent at UMass only. It is a problem facing all Massachusetts colleges, he said.

The state is very much aware of the shortage of interpreters for the deaf. In fact, the Massachusetts Commission for the Deaf and Hard of Hearing is anxious to start an interpreter training program in Western Massachusetts.

However, according to Appleby, this is something which will not be seen for a couple of years. But, once begun, it will do a lot to alleviate the shortage, he said.

Even with the shortage, students praise the work of the Handicapped Student Affairs office. Marjorie Stout, a student who is hard of hearing, said, "Deaf Services and Handicapped Student Affairs are wonderful for us, and they help us a lot, and also try to get us to be aware of what we need in our lives."

Workshop helps those with math anxiety

By JANINE WARNER
Collegian Staff

Were you mortified in elementary school math class? Did everyone else understand long division while you struggled to remember your times tables?

The math anxiety workshop, offered by the math department and the Counseling and Academic Support Center, was developed eight years ago to help students overcome math anxiety.

"People get a lot of comfort and support when they find out there are other people with the same problems," said Doris Stockton, a professor in the math department and co-facilitator of a math anxiety workshop.

Donald Banks, a counselor in the center and co-facilitator of the workshop, said, "We don't teach math at all. We only try to deal with the anxiety around it."

The first session of the three part workshop is designed to let students get acquainted with each other, Stockton said. "Don asks them to tell us why they came. He's very good at getting people to talk," she said.

Banks said, "They get a chance to hear that other people have had very embarrassing experiences in the math classroom. It gets the issue out in the open.

"We've had people who came in very uptight come back later and tell us they were able to get in touch with their feelings and do well in class," he said. Once a student can confront the reasons for difficulty in math they "can accept responsibility for learning," he said.

"We focus on making sure students are in the right level," he said. "If you are math anxious, and if you're in a math class that you know is beyond your comprehension, you probably need to drop back to a lower level.

"Even though they may not get credit for the '0' level math class, in the long run they are better off," he said.

"People think they are not smart enough," Banks said. But, "there are many external reasons people have trouble in math."

"We generally find there are two major causes," said Stockton. "A person may have been asked at some stage of development to do math at a level they were not ready for."

Stockton cited long division as a common stumbling block for students. "No two people are ready to do long division at the same instant," she said. "But students get intimidated if other students can do it and they can't.

"It's like asking someone to go into lifesaving without learning to tread water," Stockton said.

A second major cause of anxiety, according to Stockton, is intimidation by someone a student respects. "A well-meaning teacher, parent or sibling might say, for instance to a girl, 'you shouldn't have to do math because your a girl.'"

"We had a boy whose mother and sister were good in math and told him he shouldn't have to do it because he was a boy."

Banks and Stockton report their workshop has been equally attended by men and women. "Sometimes we have more men than women at our workshops, sometimes more women," Stockton said.

Banks said from his experience he feels the stereotype that men do better than women in math is changing. "There was a time that there seemed to be a breakdown of what were guy things to do and what were girl things to do. Guy things were more mathematically oriented," he said.

Now, given the changing career goals of college students, that stereotype is changing, he said.

"We try to help them realize that if they can't deal with math successfully or are choosing to avoid it that they are limiting their career choices. At least 60 percent of the majors on this campus require math," he said.

"We have a large variety of students in the workshops," said Stockton. Workshops are attended by first year students and graduate students, returning students and students fresh out of high school.

"We're not suggesting people can become math geniuses," said Banks, "but they can have better mental math health."

Voting rally scheduled for today

As part of Voter Action Day, a rally for education will be held at 1 p.m. today on the Student Union steps.

The rally, which is sponsored by the United States Student Association (USSA) and the Student Government Association, is being held to promote student-voter awareness, said Jason Rabinowitz, SGA co-president-elect. The rally will address issues such as budget cuts in education, rising tuition costs and fees, and national campaign issues important to students, Rabinowitz said.

The president of USSA, Fredrick Azcarate, is scheduled to speak at the rally.

Also, the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group will have voter registration tables set up in front of the Student Union mini-store from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m.

Odds and ends

Opening the real book on what the Annex does

I feel I must defend an institution that isn't very popular at this university - the Textbook Annex.

In my four years as an undergraduate and two years as a graduate at UMass, I have seen numerous attempts to depict the Annex as a money-grubbing, student-using establishment. It seems that every other semester someone decides that something should be done about this evil institution. A committee is then formed to find how badly the Annex is ripping off the students.

Mark Dadmun

It's funny how the results of this committee are never seen. I believe that's because they find out the truth, which doesn't support their claim.

I have worked at the Textbook Annex since my sophomore year. I would like to set the record straight on misconceptions about the Annex, the biggest of which is the pricing of the books and who sets the price. The average mark up the store charges a customer is 20 percent. The Annex reduces this by five percent. All wages, operating costs, shipping and handling, and upkeep are taken out of that 15 percent. As any business student can tell you, selling your inventory for 15 percent profit is not a very lucrative business. The only reason a profit is seen at the Annex is due to the large inventory.

Another misconception of the Annex is that it is a private company milking the students for all they're worth. It is, in fact a part of the University Store, and thus all profits realized at the Annex are used for the operation of the campus center. The Annex was first established as a convenience for the students. It is there so that students don't have to go downtown to get their books. No one is driving around in a Porsche because of the profits made there.

Beyond prices, the one thing I hear the most about is the prices the Annex sets for buying books back. There are set rules for the process of buying back books. The Annex can only afford to buy back the books if they know they are going to be used the following semester. The deadline for ordering books for the following semester is set for October and April, so professors will place orders. If a book has been ordered by a professor then the Annex will buy back the book at 50 percent of the new price. If the book has not been ordered, then a used book service may buy it, but they set the price. Therefore, if more professors would order earlier, the Annex would pay students more money.

It's difficult having over 20,000 people come through the Annex doors in the course of two weeks, without anyone waiting more than ½ hour, but they do it. Some have been there all summer working in 100 degree heat, some just work for the first three weeks, but they all pitch in to get you in and out as quickly as possible.

So the next time you feel like complaining about something like the Annex, appreciate the work done to provide this service, and take the time to get the facts, not just the rumors.

Safe environment for post-season needed at UMass

October means many things to many people. To a good majority of those acorss campus, October means baseball. Once again, the Northeast is lucky enough to have both the Boston Red Sox and the New York Mets in the playoffs. there are thousands of jubilant fans at UMass ready to cheer on their team.

The playoff games are a time of celebration, and we encourage you to watch the games and root for your team. However, we want to remind you of the racially-motivated violence that erupted after the 1986 World Series between the Red Sox and the Mets. The violence was caused by many factors, but was triggered by the outcome of game seven of the Series.

It is our hope that every member of the UMass community will respect those around them, allow free expression over the outcome of the games, and celebrate in a safe manner.

The area governments are making a strong commitment to making this year's playoffs and World Series safe for the entire community. Each area is sponsoring viewing locations to watch the games and will also be providing refreshments. These locations will be a great place to gather with other fans to watch the games in a festive atmosphere. The World Series also coincides with mid-terms, so please remember those with exams who may be unable to watch the series.

The University of Massachusetts has been a leader in the nation for its efforts to provide an atmosphere open to the celebration of diversity in opinions and cultures. Please help us continue in a community effort toward this goal. Have a great post-season, and may your team do well.

Bush offers unrealistic solution for drug problem

It seems that the topic of drugs has been heated up again, due to the recent disqualification of Ben Johnson in the Summer Olympics. The fastest man in the world was stripped of his gold medal due to the use of steroids, proven by a drug test.

In fact, one Olympic watcher (W. Greg Rothman) was so angered at this fallen, demoralized young athlete, he wrote a stirring column in Monday's paper ("Snorting away America's future," Oct. 4) about his conception of the drug problem. Yet how close were his solutions to realistic ones?

The solution proposed was to increase penalties for dealers or users, even calling for harsher penalties for the 'casual user.' In other words, he feels we should jail the guy working at Dairy Queen who was found with a joint in his pocket. This would require more courts, officers, and prisons. Yet no one wants a prison in ones's own backyard, and funding for these things is not going to suddenly materialize. Perhaps we can cut social programs to zero, since touching the defense budget is a republican's nightmare. The reality of it is, none of these 'solutions' has touched base with the source of the problem. One has to ask, "Why are these kids taking drugs?" Then, eliminate the cause.

Drugs are legalized in different countries, yet no other country has fifteen-year-old kids being mowed down with uzis over turf boundaries. Drug abuse is the result of an unhealthy society, not the cause of one. Only recently has it hit every aspect of society, which has caused the stuffed shirts in legislation to sit up and take notice.

Bush's solution is also to 'crack down' on users and pushers. That way, he can sleep at night while he mutilates social and housing programs aimed at helping those mere millions who are less fortunate than himself, while claiming to have saved them from drugs. I'd hate to have him offer a solution to the family of a suicidal child: "Just get rid of all the razors in the house and send her to bed without dinner." By offering a solution of harsher punishment for drug users, Bush is ignoring the causes and realities of drug abuse. This country needs an administration that is focused on eliminating these causes. Flooding prisons with drug addicts is simply displacing the problem, not dealing with it.

In other news. . .

All week long, you're so. . .good. You eat your bran cereal, sip your mineral water, skip those desserts at lunch. But on the weekend, you're so. . .bad. You get into your sweats, plop down in front the VCR and dig into the Haagen-Dazs and microwave popcorn.

Sound familiar? You're not alone. Experts call it the diet dichotomy: health-conscious Americans are eating more veggies and whole grains than ever. But they're washing them down with pints of premium ice cream, handfuls of salty snack foods, bags of jumbo cookies and other nutritional nightmares. Last month's issue of Gorman's New Product News finds that of the record 7,866 new-food products introduced in the United States last year, a surprising number were either relentlessly nutritious or densely caloric. It's "shopper's schizophrenia," says Gorman's editor, Martin Friedman. "People have a split personality regarding food."

Inside the shows at Sheehan's and Iron Horse

Girl fan flips over PSD show

The Pajama Slave Dancers
Saturday night at Sheehan's Cafe

So there I sat. Downstairs at Sheehan's, 10:30 p.m. last Saturday night, anxiously awaiting the band that saved my summer. Listening habits on the Cape were downright depressing, with WPXY, the only non sugar-pop station, occasionally playing old Steve Miller . . . ooh.

My Pajama Slave Dancers tape, Blood, Sweat and Beers, made a few muscle-head enemies on the beach with the lyrics "look the gift horse in the mouth and burst through amber sky/I'm coming for you, baby/I wanna play salami with you," from the mock Led Zeppelin tune "I Want To Make love to You." And with the lines: "bass drums pound in your brain and your insides are gonna explode. You promise you'll never act so insane as your bathroom veers off the road" from "Driving the Porcelain Bus" — the quintessential puking song — it is obvious that PSD have a unique grasp on how to annoy the stodgy.

I was looking forward to hearing a few of these favorites and some new stuff. But the new stuff never came — and they do

Uncle Bonsai had no penis envy

Uncle Bonsai
Monday night at the Iron Horse

Most people have never heard of Uncle Bonsai; that's probably because they are folk singers. Singing folk music in 1988 can be very risky, in a financial sort of way, which is probably why they are on the Freckle record label. I went to see Uncle Bonsai at the Iron Horse on Monday night because they sing about penis envy. Anybody who sings about penis envy is okay with me, even if they are folk singers.

Uncle Bonsai is not a dance band, so the Iron Horse was a good place for them to play. The Iron Horse has lots of tables and chairs and musical things nailed to the walls so it's a good place to bring a date, if you don't want to dance. Just don't sit facing away from the stage or you might think you're in some kind of dark family restaurant.

Dave Wilcox from Nashville opened the show, and he was great. Go see Dave Wilcox if you get the chance; he sounds just like James Taylor on his cassette, but don't hold it against him. In person he's great.

selling cassettes, the Iron Horse staffers made everybody quit smoking for the rest of the show because Uncle Bonsai said so. Uncle Bonsai is two women and red-bearded man with a guitar, and they started singing about putting Julie Andrew out of her misery so pretty soon nobody minded that they coun't smoke. They sang about Love, and Doug and cooking chihuahuas in a microwave so I didn't mind that they never actually sang about penis envy. It was a good show.

Uncle Bonsai's music works on several levels, and all that other stuff that people say in music reviews. I like Uncle Bonsai because they are funny and serious at the same time and because you can understand the words when they sing. Since Uncle Bonsai won't be coming back here soon, go buy their records.

have a new album out. (However, it was so loud when the name was mentioned that I missed it.)

The opening band, the Blood Oranges abated my anxiety. Their style was a weird but effective blend. Very folky but containing distinct rhythm and great drums — absolutely no banjos. I danced a jig to one song and guzzled beer to anohter. A weird blurb to describe them: an international folk jam.

Finally, PSD set up. By this time, all the semi-locals had drank their fill and were ready to interact with them. There was silly string flying, microphone grabbing, younger brothers bouncing, and yes, contra Sheehan's policy — slam dancing. The band conscientiously suggested pogo dancing, but who listens at a bar? Anyway, the band soon succumbed to the fan frenzy and played only the old favorites that led to drunken attempts at lyrical symbiosis.

But who am I to bitch about no new songs? They had a good time, inspired a good time, even though they didn't start at a good time. It's refreshing to see a live band that takes itself lightly, instead of wallowing in epic, egosticial sludge. Amen.

Bragg's musical additions welcome on latest LP

By JODY GABIN
Collegian Correspondent

Billy Bragg
Worker's Playtime
Go! Discs/Elektra Records

Worker's Playtime, Billy Bragg's sixth release since his debut in 1984, once more combines the singer/songwriter's unabashed political views with the frustrations of unrequited love.

Moving away from the minimalist style of his earlier albums, Bragg has added an array of accompanying instruments and backing vocals. These additions mark significant progression in Bragg's style, and the accompaniment demonstrates Bragg's maturity and improvement as a musical artist without compromising his original style and character.

"She's Got a New Spell," a traditional Braggart love song, opens the album on an upbeat note, with an arrangement reminisent of his 1986 single "Greetings to the New Brunette."

"Must I Paint You a Picture," a collaboration of bass, piano, organ, and guitar, starts off strongly, but the added voals of Cara Tivey, while fine as a back-up, take away from the song when she sings an entire verse.

Bragg's moving acapella effort, "Tender Comrade," powerfully illustrates the bond established between soldiers during wartime.

Bragg sings lyrics such as "Will you say that we were heroes/Or that fear of dying among strangers/Tore our innocence and false shame away," with the same intensity as when covering the Sweet Honey and Rock song,"Chile Your Waters Run Red Through Soweto" which was released earlier this year on his live EP, Help Save The Youth of America.

"The Only One," one of the album's more moving songs, has the same heart-wrenching quality of Bragg's 1984 "Man in The Iron Mask." His Sandy Denny/Fairport Convention influence is strongly detectable in the musical arrangement as well as the lyrics.

The album's closing song, "Waiting For The Great Leap Forwards," is a straight-forward revolutionary cry which begins gently with "it may have been Camelot for Jack and Jacqueline/But on the Che Guevara highway filling up with gasoline/Fidel Castro's brother spies a rich lady who's crying," and ends with a sing-a-long style not unlike that of Woody Guthrie, Bill Staines, or more specifically, English socialist folk singer (and admitted Bragg influence) Leon Rosselson. Bragg is joined by a chorus of voices (including that of current touring mate, Michelle Shocked) to belt out the last few verses.

Another potential scenario involves another election. Senator Brian Darling has submitted a motion calling for another election in November.

Fadel said this motion will have to be tabled for one week and is a bad idea because of the appeal pending on the original election.

Tonight's meeting could see another amendment to the bylaws to require all meetings of student government bodies, committees, and boards be open to the public.

The motion is unclear, however, about whether it would prevent SGA bodies from entering into executive session. Darling could not be reached to clarify the intent of the motion.

This motion is apparently in response to complaints about a Sept. 8 meeting of the SGA Coordinating Committee. The committee moved into executive session, apparently to discuss misuse of funds by then-Budgets Chairman Gil Penchina.

The move into executive session barred all non-members of the committee from attending. The Collegian has asked for an investigation by the Hampshire County District Attorney's Office to determine if this is a violation of the Massachusetts open-meeting law. The question now is whether the SGA is a governmental body as defined by state law. The district attorney has sent Fadel a series of questions to make this determination.

Fadel said he was in the process of answering the questions, with advice from legal counsel. He said he would have no problem answering the district attorney's questions by the requested Oct. 14 date.

The meeting could be interrupted, however, by a motion concerning the placement of a police sub-station in Washington Residence Hall.

Senators Ted Maravelias, Christa Lajoie and Brian Darling said in a memo to Fadel that they intend to suspend the rules tonight to ask for a referendum question to be placed on the upcoming senate election ballot.

The question would ask students whether the sub-station should be removed.

While the referendum would have no binding power, Maravelias said it "will tell the community that we as students are fed up with punitive actions without due process."

Maravelias, who is not a resident of Washington, said the station would create a "police state" in Southwest Residential Area.

Another motion on tonight's agenda would establish a caucus for disabled students.

The motion, authored by Senator Howard Dreyfus, proposes one senator be appointed to the Senate from Abilities Unlimited. In addition, Dreyfus' motion stipulates one senator be appointed from each residential area in which less than one-third of the buildings are handicap-accessible.

The motion allows the senate to nullify the appointment when the residence halls comply with the motion.

Dreyfus, said the motion is intended to eliminate "architectural discrimination" on this campus. He said only three of 41 residence halls on campus are handicap-accessible, and the University has not kept up with plans to make the buildings more accessible.

"I look out and say, 'that's still my lineup,' the one that people were saying in spring training could win it. I felt all along they were a good ballclub, and I'm happy they came around and won a division."
—Ex-Red Sox Manager John McNamara [Boston Globe]

■ women's soccer

"Everything I ask from them, they give. It's terrific," Rudy said. "Tactically, you ask for something, and it gets done."

The Minutewomen outshot the Wildcats, 17-1, as goalkeeper Carla DeSantis posted her sixth shutout in eight games.

"New Hampshire came out to play. They are a good team," Kater said. "It seems every team gets up for us. We were coming off three games in a row, so this was a real test for us, to see how we could handle it psychologically and physically. The way we played, it think we'll be able to handle it."

Kater and the rest of the Minutewomen were banged up this weekend, playing successive games on AstroTurf against Rutgers and Holy Cross. Needless to say, it was good to be home.

"It's great to be back to our AstroDirt field," Rudy joked. "The legend of Boyden lives on."

Indeed, yesterday's win pushes the team's record at Boyden to a sizzling 55-2-2. Exactly the stuff legends are made of.

Sidelines: At last, the Minutewomen get a break in their schedule. Having successfully conquered this four-game, seven day stretch, UMass will enjoy a three-day break before traveling to Storrs, CT. to face rival University of Connecticut on Saturday.

■ field hockey

Senior Amy Westerman tends the goal for the Huskies. In seven games, Westerman has recorded four shutouts, 38 saves, and has given up three goals. She limited North Carolina to only one goal at Northeastern.

For UMass, Cindy Cox should get the call for the start. Cox has appeared in all nine of UMass' games, giving up only two goals for a 0.22 goals against average. Cox has made 40 saves.

Leading the attack for UMass, which has already scored 28 goals on the season, is senior Tonia Kennedy. Kennedy leads the Minutewomen with 10 goals and one assist.

Junior Kathy DeAngelis is second to Kennedy in points with nine. DeAngelis, who led the Minutewomen in points last season with 19 goals and no assists, has already dished out three assists this year and is leading the team in that category. That could be due in part to the return of Kennedy who sat out all of last season with an injury. The Minutewomen now have two dangerous scoring threats that defenses must deal with.

UMass has also received some scoring punch from sophomore Elise McDevitt, who has come off the bench to score four goals.

If NU shuts down that threesome, it could be a very tough day for UMass. But the only team that has been able to do that thus far is Old Dominion.

Men's and women's soccer each win by one

Women slip past Wildcats, 1-0

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

The weather may have gotten colder during the second half of yesterday's women's soccer game, but the University of Massachusetts was just starting to heat up.

The Minutewomen, facing the University of New Hampshire, turned on the steam to dominate play in the second half, holding off the challenge of the Wildcats for a 1-0 win at Boyden Field.

Sophomore midfielder April Kater, who had missed a couple of big opportunities earlier in the game, bounced back to convert a great set-up header by Sue Cooper. Kater took the cross pass near the right post and dumped it past goalkeeper Janene Tilden at 50:51. The goal was a team-high fourth for Kater.

"It took a while to get one in," Kater said. "We've been practicing finishing all season."

"She (Kater) has been really hurting, but I thought today she did very well," coach Jim Rudy said. "She missed a lot of lay-ups, but she hung in there for that last one."

When the one did go in, it was more than enough for the 'W' for UMass. When holding the opponents to just one shot on goal, a lot of offense isn't a glaring necessity.

The Minutewomen, now 8-0 and ranked third in the nation, could have had more problems than originally anticipated. Senior forward Beth Roundtree sat out the game nursing an injury, and then starters Sue Gaudette and Cathy Cassady each went out in the first half with ankle problems.

But UMass got some stellar play off the bench and a couple of career efforts from other starters to come through with flying colors.

"We did pretty well considering one of the leading scorers in the region (Roundtree) didn't play," Rudy said. "And then to lose Gaudette and Cassady to ankles, we had three starters sidelined against a nationally-ranked team (UNH dropped out of the poll released yesterday). But the people off the bench did great, and some people had their best games."

One of them was Cooper, who aside from setting up Kater's goal had what Rudy called her "best game by far attacking off the left flank." It was this aggressive penetration that allowed her to set up the winning goal.

Also, after Gaudette went out, junior back Sarah Sztetela picked up the pieces and played brilliantly. Gaudette's assignment was to shadow, hamper and generally bother UNH's star forward Diane McLoughlin. Sztetela answered the call and McLoughlin was never a factor in the game.

And, for the second straight game, Rudy was able to get big contributions from his bench corps. In Sunday's win at Holy Cross, Rudy shuttled in extra players to keep his road-weary team fresh. With yesterday's sudden injury burden, the subs got pressed into action again and performed admirably.

Freshman Tracy Arwood, who started in place of Roundtree, had an exceptional game in the midfield in her first collegiate start. She also made a smooth transition to the backfield after Gaudette's injury.

"She did equally well in both positions. She's a well-rounded player," Rudy said.

Also filling in were Robin Runstein, Teresa Eastmond and Kim Montgomery, who provided the needed relief in the attack in the second half.

These changes could have caused a problem for Rudy as far as his game plan. With Cassady out, the Reds (Rudy's nickname for the team, because of their all-red uniforms) lost a good deal of the attack on the right side, but picked it up on the left. And with that, the Minutewomen put New Hampshire to bed.

"When I put Arwood in back, I added an extra midfielder (Runstein) instead of a forward. Then we dominated," Rudy said. "I was a little scared that the fourth midfielder would take away from the attack, but it locked up the center.

Minutemen win third in a row, 3-2

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team picked up a big win last night by beating Brown University, 3-2, in Providence, R.I.

The win was the third straight for the Minutemen, who improve their record to 6-3 on the season.

"This was an excellent game, really exciting to watch," said UMass coach Jeff Gettler. "It's a great win."

The Minutemen had to battle through wind, rain and playing under the lights to get this win, and overcame all obstacles.

UMass never trailed in the see-saw affair, getting on the board first midway through the first half. A ball was driven across the wet field on the right flank, where Tom Skiba got hold of it off to the side. He played the ball to Carl Hanks, who knocked it home.

Next came what could have been a major letdown for UMass, as the Bruins scored to tie it with one second left in the half.

Following a foul, with the clock running, a Brown player chipped the ball over the UMass defensive wall by the far post. A header went off the post, but the rebound was put in just before the halftime horn could sound.

The Minutemen bounced back, though, at about the 65-minute mark. After a foul, Steve Cesnek took a free kick and bent it around the defending wall and inside the far post for a 2-1 lead.

Brown would tie it again, capitalizing on a defensive lapse of the Minutemen's parts. A Brown player took a shot from about 35 yards that struck a UMass defender in the head and got past goalkeeper Sam Ginzburg.

"We sat back and got a little too defensive. The kid struck the ball well, though," Gettler said.

But UMass would have the final say off a corner kick. Hanks got the ball to Peter McEvoy who found a wide-open Cesnek cutting around behind the defense at the back post. McEvoy got the pass off and Cesnek drove home his second goal of the game to complete the evening's scoring.

Both teams got off 24 shots in the game. Gettler cited the play of Ginzburg, who was "absolutely gigantic in the last six minutes. This was probably his best game yet at UMass."

Gettler was also happy with the way UMass handled its intensity, and says that the team must keep it up. The Minutemen host Fairfield tomorrow at 4 p.m. at Boyden Field.

UMass lays claim to no. 3 rank in the nation

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team is coming off a week when it won three straight road games before yesterday's 1-0 win over New Hampshire at Boyden Field.

The effort paid off.

In the Intercollegiate Soccer Association of America (ISAA) Division I national poll released yesterday, the Minutewomen were ranked third, two spots ahead of the fifth position which they held last week (see adjacent related box).

The Minutewomen, with 252 points, sit behind only the University of North Carolina (a perfect 300, just like in bowling) and North Carolina State (285), each of whom has held its current position since the first week of the season.

The University of California-Berkeley, which was third, dropped to fifth (241), while Colorado College moved into fourth with 248 points.

The University of Connecticut, which hosts UMass this Saturday fell to eighth after losses to Barry (Fla.) University, the top-ranked Division II team, and the University of Central Florida, the former team of UMass coach Jim Rudy.

The following is the top five in this week's Intercollegiate Soccer Association of America Division I women's soccer poll:

Men's tennis beats two Conn. teams, loses to Providence

The University of Massachusetts finally conquered its toughest opponent of the year — the rain.

Poor playing conditions have hampered the Minutemen's season by cancelling or postponing most of UMass' early-season.

This weekend, however, the Minutemen dodged Mother Nature's cruelty and posted wins over Central Connecticut State University, 5-4, on Friday and the University of Connecticut, 5-3, yesterday at the upper Boyden courts. The one down point for UMass was that they were dropped unmercifully by Providence College 8-1.

In yesterday's match, the Minutemen got victories from their number one singles player, Brian Gable, 6-2,6-3; senior Joe Desormiers, 6-2, 6-3; and number four singles player freshman Paul Audet 6-1, 6-1, who UMass coach Manny Roberts calls "the future for us."

With the score tied at three, the Minutemen looked to their doubles team to haul in their victory — and boy did they deliver.

The number one tandem of Gable and Desormiers ripped threw their match in straight sets 6-2, 6-2. Number three Chris Johnson and Rich Stone won equally as handy, 6-2, 6-1.

"I was very pleased. Everyone played well," Roberts said.

The Minutemen are scheduled to play the University of Hartford on Thursday at the upper Boyden courts.

UMass gears up for No. 7 NU

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

Last Friday, the University of Massachusetts field hockey team played the No. 1 team in the country, Old Dominion University. Today (3 p.m., Totman Field) it will play Northeastern University which is the No. 7 team in the country as ranked by the NCAA in a poll just released yesterday.

But today's game is more important than Friday's for one very big reason. When the teams are selected for the NCAA tournament after the completion of the regular season, the top team from New England will be invited.

New England is a very strong region. There are five teams from N.E. ranked in the top twenty of the country. The Minutewomen have moved up to the No. 3 spot this week. Boston University is ninth, followed by Providence College (16th) and Boston College (19th).

"The top few teams in New England can play with anyone in the country," Hixon said.

UMass, 8-1, currently holds the No. 1 spot in New England with NU, at 5-1-1 holding the No. 2 position. The Huskies only loss was to the University of North Carolina.

"They're a very fast team," UMass coach Pam Hixon said. "But they play most of their games on turf, they are accustomed to playing on it. As with Old Dominion it is going to be interesting to see how they play on grass."

Northeastern is led by junior Annie Nucera who has seven goals and two assists. Senior Jeanine Fisher (5 goals, 1 assist) and junior Andrea Topping (2 goals, 3 assists) make up the of the bulk of the offense for NU.

Sub-station question approved for referendum

By GEORGE FRANCY
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Student Senate last night approved a referendum question about the police sub-station in Washington Residence Hall for the Oct. 11 Student Government Association election ballot.

The question asks whether the station should be removed. Student leaders are expecting a strong "yes" response to this question.

Ted Maravelias, who made the proposal, said, "I'm not in agreement with the administration's decision to place the station in Southwest." He said the question was designed "to send a message to the chancellor to say the students are unhappy with the station.

"Even though we expect this to pass, we believe the chancellor will overlook the students as he has in the past," Maravelias said, citing the alcohol policy as a point where he said the administration has overlooked student input.

If 15 percent of those eligible to vote in the election do so, and then vote against the sub-station, the SGA could set up a panel to discuss alternative locations for the station with the administration.

Several senators asked whether the question was too specifically worded. Supporters of the referendum question said the purpose of it is to get a general feeling of whether students want the sub-station.

In other action, the senate defeated a motion that would have appointed 16 senators from the Commuter Area Government. The move was put forth by Senator and CAG President Jay Festa.

Opponents of the appointments said Festa was trying to "stack" the senate with the appointments. Festa said the appointments were to get a fair representation of the commuter area.

"The senate has stripped the commuter area of its right to representation. It's an insult to the commuter area," Festa said.

He said the appointments were approved by the CAG. He said there were several motions the appointees could have voted on, but now would not be allowed to because the senate had voted down the appointments.

Also on the agenda last night was a move to establish an Abilities Caucus. The proposal, written by Senator Howard Dreyfus, was postponed indefinitely from consideration by Dreyfus because he saw little support for the motion.

"There are some problems with the wording of the motion, and we're going to work on it," Dreyfus said.

"There's a lot of people against it and I'd rather it come back when we're on our best feet," he said.

The move would have allowed for an appointed seat from Abilities Unlimited, and another appointment for each residential area in which one third of the dorms are not handicap-accessible.

Ex-sox players do in Bosox

By BEN WALKER
AP Baseball Writer

BOSTON — Dave Henderson, a former Boston postseason hero, singled home the tie-breaking run in the eighth inning and the Oakland Athletics beat the Red Sox, 2-1 Wednesday in the first game of the American League playoffs.

Jose Canseco's home run had held up since the fourth inning as Oakland's Dave Stewart and Bruce Hurst hooked up in a pitching duel. But Wade Boggs hit a sacrifice fly in the seventh, setting up Henderson's heroics on a chilly afternoon at Fenway Park.

Carney Lansford hit Hurst's first pitch in the eighth for a double and Henderson grounded the next pitch into right field for the go-ahead single.

Henderson, cheered in the pre-game introductions, was Boston's savior in the 1986 playoffs against California. His home run rescued the Red Sox when they were one strike from elimination in Game 5, and History, money, and increased security are the primary elements of a plan by Public Safety Director Arthur Hilson to handle possible unruliness if the Boston Red Sox and the New York Mets square off in the World Series.

Since the Red Sox and the Mets have a shot at facing each other in the World Series, many people at the University of Massachusetts are reminded of the last time the two teams met in the playoffs.

A brawl erupted in the Southwest Residential Area on the night of Oct. 27, 1986, after the Mets beat the Red Sox in the seventh game of the World Series. The incident was called racially motivated.

Two weeks ago, Hilson announced he had a safety plan but had not released any details before yesterday. During an interview with the Collegian, Hilson said one of the weapons he has is history.

Vice presidential hopefuls debate in Omaha

Bentsen, Quayle go toe-to-toe on issues

By WILLIAM M. WELCH
Associated Press

OMAHA, Neb.— Vice presidential candidates Dan Quayle and Lloyd Bentsen clashed last night in campaign debate, the youthful Republican pronouncing himself fully qualified for the high office he seeks and his Democratic rival saying there is no "margin for error" in the White House.

Quayle played the role of aggressor in the opening moments of the debate, constantly turning his answers into attacks on Michael Dukakis even as he defended his own readiness for the vice presidency. "If qualifications alone are going to be the issue in this campaign, George Bush has more qualifications than Michael Dukakis and Lloyd Bentsen combined," he said.

Bentsen, who has sharply questioned Quayle's maturity on the campaign trail, said a vice president must be prepared to take over "without any margin for error".

"The debate is about the presidency itself," he said. "The stakes could not be higher."

Bentsen took aim at Bush, recalling the vice president's vote in favor of a budget plan to curtail Social Security cost-of-living increases.

The vice presidential rivals shook hands and smiled as they met at center stage for the beginning or their 90-minute televised debate.

The opening question came from moderator Judy Woodruff, who asked Quayle why he thought he had not made a more "substantial impression" on fellow republicans, some of whom have openly criticized the Indiana senator. The audience erupted in cheers and boos, prompting Woodruff to appeal for silence during the high-stakes debate.

But a few moments later, some in the auditorium broke out in derisive laughter when Quayle strongly defended his voting record on environmental issues.

Second LaRouche trial rejected

BOSTON (AP) — A new trial for political extremist Lyndon LaRouche and associates would violate the defendants' Fifth Amendment rights against being tried twice for the same charges, an attorney told a federal appeals court yesterday.

But judges appeared to doubt defense attorney Matthew Feinberg's arguments that prosecutors deliberately delayed proceedings to cause a mistrial. And one judge's comments prompted Feinberg to consider asking that the judge be removed from the case.

"The issue before the court is whether or not . . . the prosecutorial misconduct that led to the delay of the jury trial was essentially responsible for the mistrial," Feinberg said.

LaRouche, six aides, and five political organizations are charged with conspiring to obstruct a federal grand jury investigation into allegations that LaRouche's 1984 presidential campaign raised more than $2 million through credit card and loan fraud.

The trial, which began in December of last year, was declared a mistrial on May 4, after Judge Robert E. Keeten ruled the protracted proceedings were placing an unreasonable burden on jurors.

The defense has maintained that the FBI and CIA infiltrated LaRouche organizations to fabricate evidence of fraud. This is the fourth time the defense has taken an issue in the case to an appellate court.

Feinberg charged that Assistant US Attorney John Markham and federal fraud attorney Mark Rasch deliberately did not divulge that a potential witness was an FBI informant until the middle of the trial to force a delay for hearings and provoke a mistrial.

Proposed Medicare hike adjusted

BOSTON (AP) — A proposed 10.7 percent increase in Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Massachusetts' rates for supplemental Medicare coverage has been reduced by one-third, following negotiations with the attorney general's office and elder advocates, officials said yesterday.

The insurance policy will now be seeking a 7.2 percent composite increase for its 300,000 direct-pay subscribers for its Medex supplemental insurance coverage.

Blue Cross/Blue Shield spokeswoman Susan Leahy said there still will be hearings before the state Insurance Division on the rate requests within the next month. But she said the intervenors now feel comfortable with the Blue Cross/Blue Shield rate proposal.

The intervenors are Attorney General James Shannon's office, the Insurance Division's State Rating Bureau, the Massachusetts Law Reform Institute and the Greater Boston Elderly Legal Services group.

The proposed rates, to take effect Nov. 1, actually contain rate decreases into two forms of Medex coverage and rate increases in two others.

Comatose police officer reportedly recuperating

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — The family of a critically ill police recruit said yesterday that he showed some signs of emerging from the coma, as a special task force assembled by Gov. Michael S. Dukakis prepared to launch its inquiry into training at regional police academies.

"There are some hopeful signs, but the doctors are still being very guarded," said Pittsfield Mayor Ann Everest Wojtkowski. She said the last reports she received from the family of Timothy Shepard were that the 25-year-old Pittsfield police cadet remained in critical condition in a Pittsburgh hospital where he underwent a liver transplant last week.

But she said the family told her that Shepard had been able to recognize his mother and pregnant wife and respond to questions by shaking his head. Doctors also have been able to remove him from a respirator for brief periods of time.

John Callahan, a former district attorney for Franklin and Hampshire counties and past president of the Massachusetts Bar Association, said his review board of legislators, police officials and doctors would have its first meeting Thursday at the University of Massachusetts Medical School in Worcester.

Callahan said he expected the main focus of the group's inquiry would be the physical and psychological training provided to police recruits at Agawam and the state's six other regional police academies. State health officials and others have blamed extended exercise without adequate water for the hospitalization of nearly one-third of the recruits in the Agawam class.

Meanwhile, an aide to House Speaker George Keverian said the speaker expected to appoint a special 11-member House committee to investigate the training academies today.

The Legislative inquiry was approved on a voice-vote last week at the urging of state Rep. Christopher J. Hodgkins, D-Lee, a former police officer. State Attorney General James Shannon has also launched an investigation into the Agawam academy.

UMass offers minority recruitment programs

By GEORGE FRANCY
Collegian Staff

Minority recruitment by the University of Massachusetts stretches as far as Puerto Rico and as near as Holyoke, with personal contact between enrolled students and potential students working to bring a diverse student body to this campus.

Nelson Acosta, assistant director of Undergraduate Admissions at UMass, explained the reason for trying to attract minority students: "I personally, and the University as a whole, don't want to have a homogeneous environment. We want to have a wide range of people."

Acosta said the number of minority students rose to 8 percent this year from 3 percent, eight to 10 years ago, as a result of the recruitment programs.

"We believe the state benefits from having educated people and students who are used to learning from each other," Acosta said. "Having diversity at the University is beneficial for all students because it gives them a broader background for life," Acosta said.

Acosta makes presentations, often in Spanish, detailing life at UMass to high school students in cities such as Holyoke, Springfield, Lawrence, New Bedford, and Boston. Student volunteers accompany him.

"We try to have students of color in the office" to answer any questions the minority recruits might have, he said.

"The greatest ambassadors of an institution are students," Acosta said.

The Admissions Office also provides several awareness days and open houses in the spring, in which students are brought from inner-city high schools to see what UMass is like.

Joshua Fontanez is one of about 30 students who work with the admissions office. Fontanez said he would not be here now if not for the minority outreach programs.

"Basically what I'm doing is putting in what I got out," Fontanez said. "I think the minority recruitment programs are effective, and that's why I try to help out any way I can."

Roberto Ortiz is another volunteer recruiter with the Admissions Office and has accompanied Acosta on one of the trips to Puerto Rico. Acosta makes an annual trip during winter break to his native country to reach students there.

"I get a lot of satisfaction out of helping my people," Ortiz said. "It's a very, very rewarding personal experience."

Anniversary of D.C. march is remembered

By STEPHEN BAYER
Collegian Staff

The first anniversary of the national lesbian, bisexual and gay march on Washington, D.C. will be commemorated Tuesday at the University of Massachusetts as part of a national "Coming Out Day."

"One year ago on October 11, 500,000 members of our community came out to celebrate our lives in the march on Washington," said Amerin Falk of the Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay Alliance. "This year, we will continue the struggle by acknowledging the importance of a national 'Coming Out Day,'" she said.

Falk said the LBGA is sponsoring a variety of events and workshops to promote a better understanding and awareness of lesbian, bisexual and gay concerns and issues.

"It's important for people within the community to understand and accept themselves," Falk said. "It's also important for heterosexuals and our allies to recognize the magnitude of the lesbian, bisexual and gay community, that we exist, and we have concerns and issues that we want addressed," she said.

To promote awareness, the LBGA has pronounced the day "Blue Jean Day" on the UMass campus. According to Falk, the purpose of "Blue Jean Day" is to encourage members of the gay community and allies to wear blue jeans to show solidarity and support.

"In order to overcome oppression, we must display pride and enthusiasm for who we are," Falk said. Wearing blue jeans symbolizes unity and weeds out "the ardent homophobe," she said. "It'll be interesting to see how many pairs of corduroys come out of the closet; pun intended," quipped Falk.

Other activities scheduled during the day include a table on the Campus Center concourse and a "Coming Out Party" with refreshments provided by the LBGA.

The LBGA has scheduled a rap session for Wednesday, Oct.12 in the club's Student Union office. And on Thursday, Oct. 13, there will be a Lesbian, Bisexual and Gay Speakers Bureau Panel open to the entire campus community.

"We're trying to create a variety of ways for individuals to become more comfortable with their identities and realize that there is a network of support available for them," Falk said.

She said the panel is important because it provides a forum for all people to learn about the reality of being lesbian, gay or bisexual both in and outside the campus community.

"As a member of the Speaker's Bureau," Falk said, "I discuss my experiences candidly in order to dispel hurtful prejudices and enable people to become more comfortable around lesbians, gays and bisexuals.

Rally to vote, mock wedding held on SU steps

● USSA rally draws 100 people on SU steps ● Satirical wedding held for UMass, military

By ALLEN BERNARD
Collegian Correspondent

Student votes count and students should exercise that right was the theme for yesterday's rally for education on the Student Union steps.

"We all need to register and exercise our right to vote," said Joseph Haslip, board member of the United States Student Association (USSA) which co-sponsored the event along with the Student Government Association (SGA).

Addressing a crowd of about 100 people, Todd Lever, SGA senator and co-host of the SGA Today radio program, said the problem "is getting the average student interested in the process of voting." He said that in the last SGA presidential elections only 15 percent of the student body voted.

In contrast, Lever said that some European countries have 80 percent turn-outs during elections.

The easiest way to get involved in government is to vote, Lever said.

The president of USSA, Fred Azcarate, said students need to be concerned with the upcoming elections because the candidates "haven't clearly outlined what they are going to do for education." He said that from 1980 to 1987 student-loan monies have been cut 24 percent and that student grants have decreased.

A speaker at yesterday's rally urges students to vote. . .

"I encourage all the people I see registering, to vote," said Azcarate, referring to the voter registration tables in front of the Student Union mini store.

Micheal Greiner, chairman of the SGA Public Policy Committee, talked of vision. "If each student just took five minutes to vote, that's what will really make a difference," he said. When legislators hear that a group of voters as large as the University of Massachusetts students are behind an issue, the legislators listen, he said.

Shari Silkoff, SGA co-president-elect, said, "We need to make a difference and we, as students, can make a difference." She

The University of Massachusetts got married yesterday.

The school, in a mock celebration, joined the military industrial complex in wedlock shortly after noon, as opposition in the audience threw rice at the participants.

The mock wedding contained such characters as Chancellor Joseph Duffey, Gov. Michael Dukakis, former President Richard Nixon, President Ronald Reagan, and the Grim Reaper, who performed the ceremony.

The students spoke out against the military being allowed to conduct research on campus, although they said the issue was neither liberal nor conservative.

The wedding march began at Machmer Hall and continued to the Student Union steps where players threw fake money in place of confetti.

On the steps Liz Miller played the part of Nixon, who was experiencing grief because demonstrations on college campuses during the Vietnam War, which caused funding for military research to be virtually discontinued.

"But soon, love blossomed again," said Daria Casinelli, who played the Grim Reaper. The comment referred to the return of military research in the 1970s.

Nancy Callahan, a student portraying Reagan, began her speech with: "They forgot the teleprompters." Hecklers in the audience chanted "Four more years, four more years." Callahan said Reagan raised the annual military budget to a figure "larger than all but nine countries' Gross National Products."

Joe Rubin, a student playing the part of Dukakis, told how he raised the spending for military research in Massachusetts to $15 million. He said students should be proud that in certain buildings on campus research is being conducted on the Strategic Defense Initiative, chemical weapons, and plastics for missiles. The opposition shouted "Dukakis is a war-monger."

UMass child care plagued by waiting lists, low funds

By JANINE MANCINELLI
Collegian Correspondent

Parents seeking day care for their children at the University of Massachusetts face waiting lists over a year long because the facilities provide 82 slots on a campus that should be accomodating 1,200, according to the child care administrator.

The extensive waiting list is causing future parents to reserve day care space in advance for their unborn children in both New World and Grass Roots Day Schools, Alicia Smith, child care administrator said.

"The Division of Capital Planning and Operations has already told us we need 1,200 slots to satisfy the campus community's needs," she said.

The need for child care is national, Smith said. "More and more families are in need of child care to be involved in the labor force," she said.

Grass Roots Day School Director Neil Brigham said, "It's beyond comprehension that there is not a greater investment toward childcare."

"I think we have to reset our priorities in this country," Smith said.

The day schools are in great need of improvements, said Mary Ellis, New World Day School director.

"These buildings were not meant to be occupied by so many people," she said. "There's not enough storage space, administrative space and kitchen space."

But, she said, the centers have received minor improvements, including an air conditioner, a clothes washer and dryer, and have improved window visibility.

Neil Brigham, Grass Roots Day School director said the school provides four bathrooms for 44 children. "I think that's adequate," he said.

The Higher Education Capital Outlay bill, which was enacted last July, provided $110,000 to UMass for the planning and design of a child care center and other renovations. UMass must apply to the state for more funding for actual construction, Rep. Stan Rosenberg said in a previous interview.

"We are in the first phase, which involves everything that leads up to putting up the bid for construction," Smith said.

The UMass planning committee will focus on the preliminary design of a new child care facility, which will accomodate an additional 72 children, Smith said. The facility will be located in the vicinity of New World and Grass Roots, she said.

The second phase will involve the construction of the new facility, Smith said. "A study team will be involved in this phase for on-campus interaction with what's going on," she said.

Although the new facility will provide 72 additional day care slots, over 1,000 spaces will still be needed, Smith said. "The monies to build a facility must come through the state and they can't make a commitment to fulfill our entire needs," she said.

Smith said the schools will be able to provide better services if new facilities are built. "[The service] will improve drastically," she said.

The cost of enrollment for UMass day care is on a sliding scale fee to meet the financial needs of parents, Smith said.

Most of the parents who use university child care are students who pay an estimated $52 per week, Smith said.

"This cost includes curriculum, nur-.urance and custodial help, and a full food program, including a morning snack, hot lunch, and an afternoon snack," she said.

In the toddler room, the teacher child ratio is one to three, and in the pre-school, the ratio is approximately one to six, Smith said. "There is always a professional staff member present."

These ratios do not include student help from the UMass school of education who may be counted if qualified, she said.

Smith said she is responsible for the university's child care fiscal operation and for appointing authorities. "I also provide support for the center directors as a liason and a spokesperson.

Brigham said, "As center director, I oversee the day to day running of centers, supervise teachers, and hold staff meetings." The daily schedule of the students begins in the morning when the children are dropped off at staggering times by their parents, Brigham said.

The children explore the activities and then gather for circle time for story reading and game playing, he said. Small group time follows with more structural activities and then there is outside time until lunch time. An extended day plan provides additional activites until the children leave at 5:15 p.m. he said.

ERA edges toward failure in congress again

By SARA GALER
Collegian Staff

In eight days, the Equal Rights Amendment will fail for the 64th time in our nation's history, unless it is ratified by congress.

Section one of the amendment states that equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of sex.

In section two, congress is provided with the power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article, and section three calls for the amendment to take effect two years after ratification.

"Women aren't equal until this is the law of the land," said Florence Frank, campaign director of Amherst Democratic Headquarters.

"The argument against [ERA] is that women only have to go to court [to enforce their rights]. But what if they can't afford it?" Frank said.

Opposers of the amendment have long argued that the U.S. Constitution already guarantees equal rights under the fifth and fourteenth amendments, according to the Congressional Research Service.

Rep. Stan Rosenberg, D-Amherst, said, "I believe that there needs to be a very clear statement through the Constitution that women have the same rights as men in all respects."

Frank said, "Opposers like the right-to-life movement see [ERA] as a threat to them. They think ERA will remove protection laws. It's a very loose argument."

Economic factors are also a problem for the amendment, Frank said. It's important "to see equal rights in terms of owning property and holding bank accounts. It wasn't so long ago that women couldn't have their own Visa [charge card]."

"Businesses should realize that women create a profitable market. The bottom line is that women earn and spend as much as men, if not more," she said.

Many states are becoming very conservative, a factor which has contributed to the failure of ERA ratification throughout the years, Frank said.

"Conservatives show a tendency to backtrack. Women have been set back by Reagan and Bush wants to put women back in the home. That's important because families need two incomes," she said.

But, "even if we have the ERA, America just can't wipe every law out. If it was passed tomorow, it would be years before its total reality was felt," Frank said.

Kirsten Hertz, of Governor Michael Dukakis' Advisory Board on Women's Issues, said, "In 1984, ERA was a big issue, then it seemed to die down. It's now resurfacing."

Kathy Anderson, aide to Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Massachusetts, said, "We didn't even push it this year because of previous results in ratification. I don't think a real ratification effort has been made."

Massachusetts passed an Equal Rights bill in 1976 prohibits universal discrimination in the state, Frank said. In that time, "we had to go and lobby the legislature to change every single law [that didn't comply with the bill]," she said. "I lobbied for seven years."

A spokesperson for the National Organization for Women said that the ERA will be introduced to Congress for the 65th time in January of 1989. The ERA was introduced to the congress now in session, which will end a week from Friday, she said.

New abortion pill approved in France

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

The "abortion pill," will eventually find its way into the United States whether or not it is approved by the Food and Drug Administration for distribution, a local gynecologist said.

"It will go one of two ways," said Dr. Walter S. Trauber, a gynecologist in private practice in the Springfield area. "[The pill] will be either approved, or bootlegged. It won't be kept out."

France recently became the first Western nation to approve the pill, known as RU486, for public use. Sweden and the Netherlands are currently testing the pill and are expected to offer it as an alternative to surgical abortion in the near future, according to Elaine McKemmie of the Family Planning Council of Massachusetts.

The drug blocks a fertilized egg, or ovum, from implanting along the lining of the uterus by preventing the secretion of progesterone. This hormone is necessary to develop a mucous-like substance required within the uteran wall to nurture the egg. The pill is usually ingested within the first six weeks of pregnancy.

The U.S. is prohibited from funding development of the pill because it is classified as an abortifacient, an agent that induces abortion. Federal funding for such research has been banned since 1974 and, coupled with the cost of product liability insurance and litigation in the U.S., further discourages private development of such technology here.

But, if the new technology does prove to be more attractive than current methods of surgical abortion, neither the FDA nor the pro-life lobby will be able to keep the abortion pill from entering the U.S., Trauber said.

"It's a drug," said Trauber. "They can't keep recreational drugs out (of the U.S.), how are they going to keep this out?"

The future of the drug "depends in part on what happens November eighth," Trauber said. "Not only the Supreme Court, but the Food and Drug Administration reads the election results too."

McKemmie said it is possible that a pro-choice Dukakis administration would oversee approval of the pill in the U.S. "There's also some slight risk, more complications, other medical issues. It's not quite as simple as that," she said.

The effects of the pill are unknown and patients will require extensive atention following use, according to a release by the Family Planning Council. Hemorrhaging, dizziness, nausea and painful contractions have also been documented as affecting users of the pill.

Raytheon, General Electric, and Prime Computer.

The ceremony ended with an actress' portraying a concerned student. She ran up to the podium and shouted, "I object." She said she objected to the University being a breeding ground for research in military technology. She said she thought college was supposed to give people a better education, not to be a place where the military could prepare for the next world war.

After the production, John Leavitt, one of the members of the cast, said he felt the audience was receptive to what the group had said, and he said now the students know the issues.

The students who partook in the demonstration said they do not consider themselves a formal group.

said that in the 1984 presidential election less than half of registered voters able to vote did.

In an interview after the rally, Azcarate said the low attendance at the rally did not bother him because the registration tables in front of the mini store were thronged with people registering to vote.

"We want to make sure we get the most students registered and the most students voting in 1988," he said.

USSA is currently on a bus tour of the country and will stop at 27 more colleges and high schools to promote voter awareness and registration through rallies similar to yesterday's.

"I think we accomplished that here. We're having an important impact on student voting,' said Azcarate. "The true test will come Nov. 8."

■ Recruitment

in the Northeast," Acosta said. He said the effort to recruit students from Puerto Rico started several years ago when there were students who were interested in having more Puerto Ricans come here.

Acosta said the Admissions Office concentrates mostly on in-state students because of the University's rule that 85 percent of the student body must come from Massachusetts. He added however, there is some recruitment in northern New Jersey and New York.

Each spring the students also participate in a phone-a-thon to minority recruits. Students who have been accepted are called and asked if they plan to attend in the fall and if they have any questions about the University.

Fontanez has worked on the phone-a-thon. He said one of the recurrent questions he got concerned the racial climate on campus.

"I think there are a lot of minority students who have been accepted that could have been scared away by the quote-unquote racial problems," Fontanez said.

The Admissions Office also participates in academic programs, such as the Challenge Program. Funds for Challenge were cut this year, and the program no longer operates in Boston, but is still active in Springfield and Holyoke.

"This is for students who have the potential for college but who might not go to college," said Juan Caban, associate director of admissions.

Caban said scholarships were awarded to students who finished the programs, but because of the cuts, there are now fewer of those scholarships to go around.

He described the program as a curriculum teaching study skills and "general conceptual learning" rather than academic subjects. Caban said this better prepares the students for the University.

"The University has always preached about strength through diversity. These programs make the University accesible and encourage people of different lands and different cultures to attend," he said.

■ Security

"I now have October 27, as an example," he said. "It gives me a chance to use a little hindsight."

Hilson said security will be increased during the games.

However, he had first declined to comment on whether there will be increased security for the games, because the question put him on the spot. He said if he answered yes, it would only reinforce the idea of a "police state" at UMass, while if he said no, people would complain about insufficient police protection.

One of the problems Hilson faces is getting extra money for the needed manpower. He said he has not yet been informed whether or not he would receive the money, but he said he plans to do everything in his power to provide a safe environment for the students.

"I will use every dime we have," he said. "And when I use every dime, I will ask for more."

"There is nothing more important than the safety and the welfare of the members of this community," he said. "It's number one priority."

Hilson said he does not foresee major problems with getting the money. He said money for public safety is more important than anything else, including things like money for a new building or money for polymer research.

Just as Quayle was asked to defend his qualifications, Bentsen was asked about his differences with Dukakis on such issues as aid to Nicaraguan rebels, the death penalty, and gun control.

"We agree on so many things, on the vast majority of the issues," Bentsen replied, and said no more about policy differences with his running mate. He spent his two-minute response saying that he and Dukakis agree on cutting the budget deficit and on a trade policy that will "stand tough for America".

Quayle said Bentsen "didn't tell you very much about what Gov. Dukakis would do.

"I don't blame Sen. Bentsen for not talking about Gov. Mike Dukakis," Quayle said. "If I had to defend the liberal policies of Gov. Mike Dukakis, I wouldn't talk about it either."

Editorial/Opinion

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted

Just my opinion

Objectivity? What's that?

Objectivity is a myth.

No question about it, anyone who tells you it isn't, is lying. You see it is part of our human nature to have opinions, likes and dislikes, even prejudices.

When reading a newspaper, magazine, or watching television or listening to radio news you ought to remember there will be a certain bias in the way the story is being presented.

Peter Leon

Most news reporting services do try and usually succeed in preventing overly slanted views, but never is it pure.

You also must remember what you're seeing or reading was brought about by a bias. The news director of the service decided that particular story was newsworthy. You also must remember that for every story you see there are at least ten stroies you won't. This can be due to a great many reasons, such as lack of staff. But also what the news director decides isn't newsworthy won't be there either. This is mild form of censorship, but most of it is necessary, these decisions do have to be made.

This is commonly referred to the power of the press. It is not to be taken lightly.

During the summer I had the chance to spend a day working for Time magazine covering the Dukakis campaign. That night I had dinner with the photographers for Time, Newsweek, the Associated Press, and the cameraman for CNN. Beyond talking about the day events we tasilked about how they, as the major T.V. news service for the U.S., the major two weekly magazines for the U.S., and a major international news service, were the eyes for the world. What they pointed their cameras at is what the people got to see. This was especially true because of the shots they took of Mike and Jesse Jackson while we were in Washington D.C. They had Jesse stand with the Washington monument in the background, and for Mike they shot him while he was at the podium speaking, but they waited for the wind to blow an American flag into the background. It made for a nice and more interesting picture.

Photographers do this all the time for everyone (including George Bush) just so the story is more interesting. They, I admit, have to do this because if they took the same picture of Mike and George no one would care about the election or candidates (not that many people do anyway). What all this means is that you the reader have to be aware, reading or watching two different news services, which are known to have opposite biases. I suggest something like Time or Newsweek, and a nightly national news show. This doesn't take up as much time as reading the New York Times or Boston Globe everyday, and also hits two forms of media, another important consideration.

What it also means is that we, the press, have to monitor ourselves and do so constantly and consistently. Fortunately the press cannot be overlooked by our government, if it were all it would be is propaganda (ever hear of Pravda). Unfortunately it can mean the press becoming to high and mighty ending, in such a state of affairs as yellow journalism. Go see the movie Citizen Kane to see what happens when yellow journalism takes the place of responsible journalism.

The reader, you, can also voice your opinion of a news service by buying or not buying it. The dollar is mighty. After all advertising gives the press the money it needs to operate, but if no one buys and reads the the paper or wathches, or listens, advertisers won't advertise for long.

Peter Leon is a Collegian columnist

What's the matter with me?

New and improved candidates

As I prepared to sit down to watch last night's blockbuster of a debate between vice-presidential candidates Dan Quayle and Lloyd Bentsen, I came to a harsh realization.

I really don't care to vote for either, and the same goes for their respective mates, George Bush and Michael Dukakis.

Jim Clark

So, without further adieu, it's time for me to go on my annual crusade to nominate another non-sensical, crazy presidential candidate for all those who have officially registered with the write-in party. . .

For those of you with good memories (assuming you even bothered to read it), you may recall that last year I went off and extolled the virtues of selecting former baseball pitcher Bill "Spaceman" Lee as my presidential choice. Lee, the official candidate of the Canadian-based Rhinoceros Party, is technically a write-in man ("If they can't spell Lee, they shouldn't be allowed to vote anyway," he says).

But I soured on the man when he came to my hometown about a month ago and had the nerve to not call me up to tell me about it. Imagine that.

Anyway, the Lee campaign never got taken too seriously, so (forgive my lack of loyalty) I found the need to change my ground.

But who? Is there someone out there somewhere that is worthy of consideration. Let's take a walk down celebrity row.

Roger Rabbit: Oh, pwwwweeeezzzze. Not him. We've had enough cartoon characters in the White House in the past.

Nah, let's start being realistic here.

Morton Downey, Jr.: A real tough cookie. He'd get the job done. No one would be able to debate him. Period. He wouldn't let any of those foreign leaders get a word in edge-wise. But everyone hates him. He'd never get elected.

Hmm. Who else is there on the horizon? Ahh, let's step into the music industry for a spell.

Bobby McFerrin: An interesting thought. Picture the new motto for America. "Don't worry, be happy." What a bright hope for the future. Nuclear war? "Don't worry." Inflation going through the ozone? "Be happy." That's it. Plain and simple.

He wouldn't even need a running mate. This one-man band could do everything himself. Walk into the oval office, and there he would be, signing legislation, while simultaneously overseeing the defense department, agreeing to trade arms to the contras (oops, sorry), visiting Yellowstone and holding a Summit with Gorby over in Geneva. Bobby McFerrin, the entire national government all in one neat package. Hey, it can't be much worse than the system we have now.

But then there are the traditionalists. The ones who still think that government the way it is today is fine and dandy. There must be a man of the old school who can bring back the glory of the past. But who? Who could turn it around?

And imagine him talking with foreign leaders. Those still not adept at English would be baffled when confronted with "Morganese." Take this Summit meeting scenario:

"That's what I say, old Gorby. Six, two and even," Morgan would say. "That's the ol' juego."

"Vat iz dis six, two und evuhn stuff?" says Gorby. "Vat iz dis juego? Ve don't understand. Ve giff up all our veapons."

He'd work wonders.

These choices may be a tad far-fetched, but given the present options. . .

In other news. . .

The unlikely hit of the Los Angeles Summer Games was water polo, the rough game played by tough guys in ear-protecting caps. The American team, led by Terry Schroeder, was fast boisterous and (as fans who drooled in the pool freely admit) hunky. They lost the gold, in a squeaker, to Yugoslavia; and the two countries may have a medal rematch this year. Five of the Americans will be back in the pool, including Schroeder, an-out-of-the-water chiropractor, and the best all-round player, real estate broker Jody Campbell, both 28. Says Shroeder, "I really like our chances."

An intensive dose of the T V line-up

I was never a TV junkie before college, but being exiled altogether from the tube by homework made my normal prescription for it feel like a deadly overdose. Three years ago, during my first semester, I concluded that beyond the horizon for higher education lies a TV whose battery is itching to be worn out.

Alise S. Harfield

So when I was diagnosed with mononucleosis last Thanksgiving, I was thrilled. But it did not infect me on its own; rather I simultaneously contracted another disease I refer to as the Line-Up. I know it was infectious because I can, like my doctor, name all the symptoms in one sentence: All My Children, General Hospital, Phil Donohue, Oprah, and Prime Time. The Line-up is a series of soap operas, talk shows, game shows, commercials, and weather reports that aim to please those who have nothing better to do than vegetate on a favorite fixture. And because my doctor said to get plenty of rest, I perfectly fit into that category.

The Line-up did not begin until I woke up every afternoon around 1 pm. For the first week of winter break I was in bliss: soaps from 1 - 3, talk shows from 4 - 6, game shows from 7 -9, and finally Prime Time. Prime Time gave me the most satisfaction, for it was during these hours that I would have been incarcerate in the Library struggling over assignments and reserved readings. Prime Time was also big time, there was of those misplaced homemakers spinning a wheel bigger than my house for a million bucks. I enjoyed nighttime TV because it did not require my undivided attention as did homework. I could easily eat dinner, listen to U2, write a letter to a friend, and gape at Danny Ainge dribbling a basketball all at once. I gained five pounds during the first two weeks of the Line-up. The doctor said this was normal, given my state of inactivity. I began to like my doctor a lot, almost as much as Dan Rather.

Then, like any other good thing that has to come to an end, the mono began to exit my well-rested, over exposed to TV body. At the same time, I discovered that missing a day or even two days of One Life To Live did not affect my overall knowledge of their plot. In fact, I found that by tuning into the last five minutes, I could gather what had happened in the entire hour of the show. I had been wasting three hours a day on soaps, when I could have learned the same thing in fifteen minutes what a professor had taken fifty to explain. I had wasted my time. Now I resented every national network for tricking me into becoming a lazy lummox, and for aiding me in gaining eight pounds in a month. Now I hoped the Line-Up would go away with the mono.

But just to be on the safe side, I weaned myself off TV slowly by writing letters to friends about the events in my life. To my dismay, there weren't any. So, I shared with them pages and pages of what I had learned by watching Phil and Oprah.

By then I was eager to return to school. Going to the library had become more fun than beating the champion of Jeopardy; even the dining hall had more appeal than cable's Julia Child. Nothing had ever inspired me to study as did the Line-Up. But first, I had to explain the contents of those horribly boring letters I had written. My friends thought I'd become an incurabe couch potato.

College parties: an educational experience?

Do you want to learn about people? Are you an anthropology or psychology major who wants an opportunity to study the field? Do you want to study the social and mating habits of humans? The place to do such studying is not in a classroom, but out in the world.

Pamela McCarthy

College parties are the place to learn about the students with whom you share this esteemed institution. The way to learn is to go to parties where you don't know many people. Being with your friends is too easy.

If you want to get noticed at a college party, you'd best get there early, but late enough to be fashionable — usually 9:30 or 10:00, when there are a lot of people there, and they've had enough drinks to be, uh, friendly. Their heads will turn, for there is a new piece of meat at the market — oops, I mean a new person to get acquainted with.

At this stage of the game, most people are pretty civilized. You'll probably meet some happening people that are really cool and fun to party with.

Alas, the party must progress.

This means more alcohol is consumed. This means people start to get obnoxious. This means most intelligent, sane people will make a quick exit before the show starts to get a little too interesting.

Unfortunately, I'm not a particularly sane person, and my intelligence will usually take a backseat to my curiosity. My question must be answered — what will these buffoons do next?

By night's end, I'm regretting my question.

Now, before I go on, I want to make it clear that I am talking about parties where I know only three people. If I'm at a party with all my friends, we don't dare pull any of this, because we'll see each other the next day. What strangers will do to each other at a party after a measly six or eight beers is incredible.

Some guys feel the need to prove their masculinity after drinking half a keg. They are charming souls, with a finesse and style only reserved for their breed of men.

When one of these guys wants to meet someone, they'll stumble up to the victim and say something to melt the heart. "Eshuse me, honey, would ya like to uh. . .BUUUURRRP, see the inside of my van?" (Nudge, nudge, wink, wink?) Of course, after a line like this, I am a helpless puddle of love.

Most men love to show off what disgusting noises they can make with their bodies. Some turn it into a contest. "Hey, fellas! Let's see who can make the grossest noise!"

Many of the women decide they are going to monopolize their take on the meat market. They'll start eying the drunken males and decide which one is going to be the not-so-lucky guy. No more batting of the eyelashes. At a couple of the parties, I've seen a few clueless dudes be cracked over the head and dragged away by the hair.

After a few fuzzy navels, people tend to get affectionate. Why, at one party, a suave psuedo-stud licked my friend's hand after showing her his tattoo. I'm sure the feel of his slimy tongue made her ready to bear him tribes of children.

What's really sad is when two people meet and actually get along. This is because the next day, the beer goggles come off. That totally together person you met could turn out to be a psycho-case, a mistake of nature, or even a punishment from God.

Myself, I think I'll skip the "field studies." I have a better time partying with my friends.

Please forgive my gender

I recently read an article called "Fail: Bright Women" by psychologist Martina Horner. It was published in an issue of Psychology Today that was printed way back in Nov. 1969. To me, the article was startling.

In the late 60s, Horner did a study to find out the relationship between the motivation for success and sex (as in male/female). She administered a set of achievement tests to 90 women, and 88 men — all undergraduates at the University of Michigan.

Bob Bobala

Along with the tests she had each student write a story based on this clue: After first term finals, John (Anne) finds himself (herself) at the top of his (her) medical school class. The men wrote about John, the women about Anne. The results blew my mind.

The men's stories about John were what you'd expect. For example, "John is a good guy who's worked hard all his life. He deserves the success he has attained. He will become rich, get a Porsche, etc., etc., and live happily ever after." There isn't anything too unusual about that.

But most of the women's stories about Anne were completely different. Take, for example, these quotes from stories which Horner used in her article:

- Anne starts proclaiming her surprise and joy. Her fellow classmates are so disgusted that they jump on her body and beat her. She is maimed for life.
- Anne is pretty darn proud of herself, but everybody hates and envies her.
- Anne feels guilty . . . she will finally have a nervous breakdown and quit medical school and marry a successful young doctor.
- Anne is a "code name" for a nonexistent person created by a group of med. students. They take turns writing exams for Anne.

What Horner determined from analyzing these stories is that "women equate intellectual achievement with the loss of femininity." For ages our society's expectations of a woman has been for her to become a housewife, a mother, and to raise a family. If she becomes successful (on a professional level, such as a doctor), subconsciously she feels that she has not lived up to society's expectation of her. On the other hand, if she fails in her own natural ambition to succeed, she does not live up to her own expectation of herself.

By studying the stories, Horner concluded that many of the women (65 percent of them) had developed what she calls "a motive to avoid success." Some women feared that success would lead to loneliness, unpopularity, and that it would even crush their hopes for getting married. Some of the women's stories showed that they felt guilty about succeeding. Other stories actually indicated that in their subconscious, many women simply denied the possibility that any woman could be successful. However, less than 10 percent of the men showed any evidence of a "motive to avoid success."

Furthermore, 77 percent of the women who initially took the achievement tests alone scored lower when they took the tests in competition with men. This led Horner to conclude that women's anxiety over success increased when they competed with men. Can you imagine that, guys!? We lower their grades just by sitting next to them at an exam.

Well, I guess you could say that this study was done 20 years ago. These are the 80s. Things are different now. Yeah, I'm sure they are. But twenty years isn't that long of a time. It certainly isn't long enough to heal the millions of women whose subconscious minds have been unmercifully wrecked by society.

What can I say? If you're reading this and you're one of those women whose subconscious mind has been crippled, and you have a "motive to avoid success" and you don't even know it, I'm sorry that it's my gender that did it to you. I hope you can forgive us, at least, someday.

Sub-station beneficial

All this hoopla regarding the new substation in Southwest is unnecessary. The negative reactions are just another case of people confusing protective and oppressive authority; an issue stemming from freedom sensitivity, or over-sensitivity, as the case may be. Freedom is the best principle in the world. When personal liberty is restricted without just cause, oppression exists and stands to be corrected. When freedom is used in ways which infringes upon the rights of others, the situation is out of hand, and requires protective authority. The sub-station is for this purpose.

Obviously, if we have something to conceal, we should be willing to accept the consequences attached to risk-taking, especially if it requires facing up to legalities. If we have nothing to hide, we should have no qualms over the substation installation, but should see its postition among us as an opportunity for further education and a safer enviornment.

If you don't believe personal safety is jepordized then just read the police report in the Collegian.

Mysticism not Satanic

In response to Rusty Denton's column ("Discovering what is Reality," Oct. 4), I am shocked that someone as "knowledgable" about the occult as Rusty would print the half-truths that he did. In the entire article about the Bible, science and the occult, he left out something very important.

A belief in what is considered by the Christian Church to be witchcraft does not necessarily mean that the person is a pagan. True, the Church has not openly endorsed astral projection, crystals, divination, aura readings, etc. However, a person can still believe in God as they practice these "occultist" beliefs. After all, God created them, didn't he?

I am a confirmed member of the Lutheran Church, and my trust in God used to be very strong. Now, however, since I have gotten into these mystical practices, my love and trust for God has increased a thousand-fold. All of my beliefs have been proved to me, and I have also been shown how it was Jesus who granted me my abilities! Not all mysticism in Satanic.

This is a very important distinction. For anyone who is interested in learning more about these beliefs, remember that God and mysticism are not mutually exclusive. On the contrary, mysticism depends on God for its power. Or Satan, depending on which one you choose. Always remember, though, you do have a choice.

I would hope that Rusty Denton would get his facts straight from now on, instead of considering himself the expert on everything.

Recreational space robbed by Southwest parking lot

Returning to my room after class, I glanced out through the window in Moore House to see who is outside playing in the field. I couldn't believe it! Everyone presently on the floor came running into my room. "What's wrong?" they were asking. My mouth was open but nothing was coming out, all I could do was point out toward where the fields use to be.

I clearly remember reading an article in the Collegian about a parking lot but I didn't expect it to happen so quickly. There is so much construction going on around campus, why start a new mess? Why not finish what you start first? I thought construction was going to be finished in Southwest by the end of the past summer. This is the third semester we will be waking up to those noisy trucks.

It is amazing how this university is not very concerned about how the students feel towards this parking lot that is presently in the process of being built. At least half the students in Southwest are feeling the same way I am.

Why weren't the students better informed about this action? It is our money that is building this lot and destroying one of our only pleasurable places, an area where we can just hang out and have a good time.

So, I have one question: Where are we suppose to go play soccer, football, and softball? Sure, we can go play on the fields in front of Boyden, but when? Intramural teams play on all the fields between 4 pm and 8 pm. So this leaves us time on the fields when we are either at class or it's after dark.

That's all we need to add to this campus, more concrete. The nice part about living in Southwest was that the fields were so close to go run around on. The main purpose for living where I presently live is so I could look out the window and see the green grassy field, then the trees, the mountains and finally the sunset. Well, this is now destroyed.

Every gig venue seems to have an underlying theme of some sort, ranging from reggae to folk. L'Oasis has and will continue to bring in the reggae acts. Tomorrow night catch the Happy Campers and on Sunday at the same venue see The Great Train Robbery. Don't forget to check out the L'Oasis Blues Jam, every Tuesday night 9 p.m. to close. Drinks are cheap and I.D's are necessary.

However this is just one of the many options to choose from this weekend. The Hampshire College-based A.M.C, The Alternative Music Collective is sponsoring two events at SAGA dining commons. Tonight, the Ben Vaughn Combo, make their debut appearance at the College with warm-ups, The Lonely Moans. Velvet Jesus, Beatrice, and headliners Boston-based The Bags are playing on Saturday night for your listening pleasure. The only thing I've heard from the Bags is that they're really loud, fast and hard. A.M.C. are servicing the area with alternative music, bringing bands that are just emerging into the scene, or who haven't been heard by a major number of people. It is wise to support this organization. If this show succeeds then other talent will have a chance. Tickets for both nights are only $2.00 for Hampshire students, and $4.00 for everyone else. Alcohol will be served for those who qualify.

Sheehan's brings good music as well. The Headless Horsemen, with opening acts to be announced, play tonght. Tomorrow is a repeat performance by the Ben Vaughn Combo. Saturday night you can see those area favorites, The Malarians (See them this week in the Valley Advocate!), with opening act Childhood, a great name for a band, and also the winners of the 1987 WBCN rumble, whatever that means. People say they're good. If you're feeling up to it, Wildcat O'Halloran will be there, for a small cover charge of course, on Sunday evening.

Avid gig-goers on Saturday afternoon may want to check-out a new band, Joe Crash and the Whiplash at the Trod (Northeast area) outdoors. They feature ex-members of the Movers, and play Rockabilly, R&B, Tex-Mex, Country-Western, and American blues. They aren't bad at all, they almost sound like the Proclaimers. Very entertaining.

Finally, at the Iron Horse Cafe, on 20 Center Street Northampton, are a series of Singer/Songwriters. Starting off with tomorrow nights performance by John Stewart, a seven year member of the Kingston Trio, and veteran of 16 solo albums. He's back by popular demand and tickets are $10 in advance, $11 at the door. Saturday night you can mellow out with Steve Gillete, only one show at 8:30 p.m., and tickets for that show are $5 at the door only. Finally on Sunday, it's a double header with Judy Polan, a Northampton resident, at 7 p.m. tickets are $6, and A&M recording artist Marti Jones, at 9:30 p.m. tickets are only $10 in advance.

A&M recording artist Marti Jones will play the Iron Horse Sunday night at 9:30 p.m.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN AND TOGETHER TO DEFEAT AIDS
A Five-College Community Awareness Program
UNIVERSITY HEALTH SERVICES PRESENT:

University of Massachusetts/Amherst

MESSAGE FROM THE CHANCELLOR'S COMMITTEE ON AIDS

Although there may be substantial disagreement regarding both the current and future prevalence of AIDS and AIDS-related problems, there is nearly universal agreement that AIDS is the most serious communicable disease problem of this century. Furthermore, although its presumed viral agent has been identified, all of the skill of medical scientists has been unable to develop either an effective immunizing agent or a therapeutic regimen that has demonstrable effectiveness and an acceptable level of toxicity. We are faced with an increasing problem but lack the tools that we have accepted as essential for the control - or even eradiction - of other major communicable diseases, such as malaria, polio, tuberculosis, syphilis, and small pox.

An additional dimension of the AIDS epidemic is the major impact it is certain to have in the political, economic, social, and ethical arenas in which the human drama develops. In the political arena it will have a profound effect upon decision-making; its economic impact is certain to be enormous, if not catastrophic; it will affect either directly or indirectly all social strata and organizations and it is already demanding that we reassess the dynamic fragile balance between the rights of individuals and the well-being of the community.

The Amherst campus has taken a number of initiatives in both anticipating and facing AIDS-related problems. These initiatives are important despite the assumption that clinical AIDS is not a serious-immediate problem among members of the campus community.

- The University Health Center has included AIDS among those conditions for which clinical services are available. In addition, through the Employee Assistance Program faculty and staff may seek information and referral and in some cases receive clinical services for AIDS. An active health education program, with outreach to the entire campus, has received generous and consistent support and has been increasingly active.
- The Executive staff adopted a policy regarding AIDS that would permit students and staff who are not at risk for contracting other diseases to continue their normal activities.
- The University Health Council (Faculty Senate) established an all-campus Task Force on AIDS

CHICKEN? HOW DO I COOK IT?

What's it like being a volunteer in a support program for persons with AIDS? A volunteer shares her experiences in the following story.

In the 1980s, as a lesbian, I live at the edge of chaos. I work in the white straight academic world where I am expected to conform and act the appropriate way for a straight woman. AIDS is considered an abstract idea that needs 'further study'. I live in the lesbian gay community where I can be myself and where the battle lines against AIDS are drawn. For being a lesbian at these times is a constant struggle against confromity, straight rules, self-doubt, racism, sexism, classism, homophobia, and now AIDS, AIDS phobia, queer bashing, and death. I ask myself, if we do not stand and take care of each other, how will we survive?

When Bob died of AIDS recently, I could not believe he was gone. He was often a difficult person to be with, but over the two months that I knew him he became my friend. Mostly Bob and I talked or sat quietly listening to classical music or just watched TV. He needed a friend to be with him, and I quickly realized that being there for someone is what a volunteer really means. What I didn't know when I took the training or even when I first met Bob was just how difficult it is to watch someone die from AIDS. AIDS is a cruel disease that does not let go. But through the pain of seeing Bob so ill, what I gained from my relationship with him was a renewed sense of humor, a renewed sense of hope, and a friend.

I first talked to Bob over the telephone when I called him to arrange our first get together. I called him to see what he wanted me to make him for dinner the next evening. Forgeting that not all people in the Valley are vegetarians, I assumed that he'd ask for some simple vegetable casserole or beans and rice. I wasn't prepared when the reply was chicken. 'Chicken,' I said. 'How do you Cook Chicken?' So there I was the next day in Stop & Shop staring at packages and packages of chicken parts -- legs, breasts, feet. Yuck! What do I buy? I was still in shock. that, however, was only the beginning. Next it was asparagus with hollondaise sauce. Then it was lobster with corn on the cob.

I fondly remember this time as 'Gretchen Goes Gourmet,' or 'Volunteer lesson No. 1.' As the Galloping Gourmet in disguise (I never did get the hollondaise sauce to thicken), I learned my first lesson as a volunteer. You can say no to the person you Education, charging the group to develop an effective program of AIDS education for the campus.

The University Health Center, in conjunction with the Massachusetts Department of Public Health, became an alternate test site for the anonymous testing for AIDS (HIV) antibodies.

In January 1988, responding to a policy recommendation regarding AIDS and STD (sexually transmitted diseases), Chancellor Duffey established a University (Amherst campus) Committee on AIDS with a broad charge "..to develop, support, coordinate, and monitor a campus-wide program of prevention, control, and treatment". The Committee was viewed as a coordinating body that would anticipate and identify problems and would make recommendations for action programs.

Among actions during the spring 1988 semester were i) support for distribution of the AIDS Resource Handbook, with recommendation for continuing distribution, ii) recommendation for revision and approval of an informational booklet regarding personnel policies related to AIDS in the workplace (including the classroom). (In essence, this is clarification of a non-discrimination policy.), iii) recommendation for a policy regarding information and response to questions from both on- and off-campus sources, iv) initiation of a campus-wide policy regarding handling of body fluids. The Committee has an impressive list of concerns for the 1988-89 year including a special concern for the needs of minority groups.

The central concern of the Committee is that problems be anticipated or identified promptly and that the campus have a dynamic coordinated program of education and action. We aim to see that every member of the campus community is concerned, has an opportunity to be informed, and takes an active part in understanding and resolving AIDS-related problems. The chair will be eager to receive at any time any suggestions regarding problems or action.

are working with. No, I don't like it. No, I don't eat it.

When Bob died, I wasn't sure that being a volunteer was really all that helpful to people with AIDS. What had I really done for Bob? But when I heard a man speak at the Lesbian and Gay Pride March this May about living with AIDS and how important support from his friends has been to him, I knew that I had really given Bob some support in living with his illness, that despite how difficult or enjoyable being a volunteer can be, the most important part of working with a person who has AIDS is to give them your support. WE will survive only through our support of each other.

HOW TO TALK WITH A PARTNER ABOUT SAFER SEX

"Sex is too serious a matter to be left to genitals." "Well-being and sexual enjoyment—you can have both."

Dr. Zilbergeld

Positive and humorous — that's Bernie Zilbergeld as exemplified by the above messages from his best-selling audiotape, "An Ounce of Prevention: How to Talk With a Partner About Smart Sex." Co-authored by well-known sex therapist, Lonnie Barbach, this pioneering casette provides scripts for talking to partners about protection against AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases.

In his lecture/presentation, Dr. Zilbergeld will cover such topics as:

- DECIDING WHAT YOU WANT TO DO AND STICKING TO DECISIONS
- BRINGING UP THE SUBJECT OF SAFER SEX
- SAYING NO TO SEX
- GETTING INTO SEX GRADUALLY
- SETTING LIMITS
- TALKING ABOUT AND USING CONDOMS AND SPERMICIDES
- TALKING ABOUT THE HIV ANTIBODY TEST
- TALKING ABOUT ORAL AND ANAL SEX

A veteran of many major talk shows, and an established sexologist, among other credentials, Bernie Zilbergeld engages his audience with a comfortable style and a commitment to the importance of sexual communication in affecting the spread of STDs and AIDS.

Many people ask, sometimes with frustration: "Sure, we know a lot about how AIDS is transmitted and the importance of condoms, but how do we go about negotiating safer sex practices?" The answer: "Come and learn some valuable communication skills from Bernie Zilbergeld."

October 11, 7:00 p.m., Herter Auditorium, UMass.

This program is co-sponsored by Mount Holyoke College, Western Massachusetts Family Planning, and the University Health Services.

IF YOU ARE "POSITIVE" BE POSITIVE

What is it like to face life after a positive HIV antibody test? The following story will give us some insights into one person's struggles in living with HIV infection. HIV is the Human Immunodeficiency Virus believed to be the cause of AIDS.

Do any of us really understand the definitions of AIDS, ARC, or SEROPOSITIVE? What is their relevance and what is the current prognosis for these diagnoses?

I fall somewhere within this group, having tested positive for the HIV antibody over a year ago, knowing the precise date of my infection (almost 5 years ago). My life has since been turned upside down and inside out and will never again be the same. I suffered a painful year of denial and depression, dwelling on death, having given up on life, convinced that my condition was deteriorating, repeatedly playing the guessing game of how long I had left to live.

I read all I could find in the Big City newspapers and popular magazines, believing every word, and I visited too many doctors and specialists, hoping that just one would offer the hope I desperately needed.

Last Fall I experienced repeated flu-like illnesses, various infections, a steady increase of fatigue, an assortment of other physical symptoms, and ultimately, debilitating depression. I finally sought help, joining a local support group, entering individual psychotherapy, and locating a sincere, sympathetic doctor, all of which enabled me to start dealing with my frustrations and fears. As a result of these actions, I began taking matters into my own hands and started an all out search for every bit of current, reliable information I could find. My insatiable hunger for knowledge led me to such publications as the AIDS Treatment News and Project Inform, which I believe are two of the finest sources of current information available to us.

I read, re-read, doubted and questioned, before ultimately deciding, contrary to the advice of several experts in the field, that the time had come for me to literally either do something or die. I was prepared to attempt at least one of the various, so-called experimental treatments I had read about, in spite of repeated warnings that, other than A.Z.T., none of these therapies had yet been proven safe or effective, nor had experiments yet been completed (or even begun) using the officially accepted double blind and placebo testing methods. . .

After lengthy discussion, argument and rationalization with those involved in my support network, I was finally convinced by my therapist and physician (whose judgments I have come to fully respect and trust) that a commitment to this treatment, the only one we were aware of at the time, was my only hope in the search for more precious time. The product was then readily available, seemingly non-toxic, and already proving to be significantly effective with many patients.

My final concern was establishing a method to monitor the results of my experiment. The day prior to starting, I had a T-Helper/Suppressor blood cell test taken, planning to repeat this test after six weeks of treatment. The initial test results indicated a T-Helper cell count of 490. (Over the previous 7 months this count had declined steadily from a high of 560).

Within two weeks of conscientious use, missing not a single dose and carefully following the manufacturers' instructions for its use, I began feeling better. The constant fatigue began to diminish; I felt renewed energy and required less rest and sleep and noticed that almost all my other persistent symptoms were either diminishing or disappearing.

Six weeks later, as planned, certain that my condition had improved and that the treatment was effective, I repeated the T-cell test. Psychologically, my greatest fear was how I might respond to the possibility that even though I was feeling better, my T-Helper cells might have continued their steady decline. The results were all but miraculous. In only 6 short weeks these cells had increased from 490 to 850 and all my other blood cell counts increased similarly, by nearly 100% from their previous levels. Perhaps, I thought, there really is a God after all.

I embraced a new, revitalized, positive outlook towards my situation and realized that I and only I, have the ability to help myself by making the potentially life-extending decisions and choices which I believe are correct for me. I continually hear the words of one doctor who has helped me enormously, with this disease exists the phenomenon wherein the patients often know more about their illness than the doctor and I am always willing to listen and learn. This is why it is so important for us to share our experiences, treatments and experimentations. They are invaluable towards the progress in finding treatments. There are new, effective treatments being investigated and tried every day now, more so than ever before; there is real promise and hope that we can fight, and possibly even outlive, this epidemic. But we must each take control and challenge the crisis with all the positive energies we have available to us, believing there is hope, constantly reminding ourselves that despair and depression are our worst enemies.

I recently returned from San Francisco where I visited the newly-formed Positive Action Health Care Clinic, the first facility of its kind in the country, set up specifically to treat Seropositive patients. It is their belief that the extensive assortment of alternative treatments, and combinations thereof, when started early, can and are extending the lives of many HIV Positives, hopefully long enough until a treatment (if not a cure) for the HIV infection is discovered.

I have outlined specific measures that have worked well for me but my intent has been to convey to all those either infected or affected by this epidemic that help has arrived and is available to those willing to search for it. Progress is being made and more hope exists every day. There is much that we can do for ourselves if we are determined and courageous enough to expend the necessary effort. Contact a local support group in your area now; subscribe to the fine newsletters and educational material that is available; become informed; and, most importantly, recognize that it is you who must take responsibility for making the decisions that can prolong and improve the quality of your own life. Being positive is the best approach to being Positive.

Dreams not real original; Avoid the Balancing Act

By GRAEME THOMSON
Collegian Correspondent
Disc Junkie

Hi, and welcome to Disc Junkie, the new column that explores all that's fash, fresh and generally fab in music, and throws in the bad stuff for good measure. Yes, music fans, this is what you've been waiting for.

Disc Junkie

First up is Master-Slave Relationship with a new LP, titled Our Lubricous Love on RRR Records. This album has been getting airplay on our very own fun 91, WMUA. I must say that the song on side two completely freaked me out when I first heard it. Whoever was responsible for the almost pornographic description of a person's "love-life" over a background of synth dischords could have Lydia Lunch, and probably Diamanda Galas as well, over for a light snack. The words "safe" and "sex" will be mutually exclusive from now on—definitely one for Tipper Gore's Christmas stocking.

Phew! After that it's almost a relief to give something a good stuffing, namely The Balancing Act (poxy name) with their LP on IRS titled Curtains. It was produced by Andy "Gang of Four" Gill. Personally, I wouldn't trust Gill as far as I could throw his car. He professed a sneaking admiration for uglee musos, Bruce Hornsby and the Range, and if anything, The Balancing Act is even uglier. They also share a unique talent for writing completely naff "aware type" lyrics, most of them play acoustic guitars and, to top it all off, they look like they came from a hippie geography teachers' convention. Avoid.

Dreams So Real is another unfash band to look at, but some of their songs from their new album on Arista, Rough Night in Jericho are actually not bad. When they're not copying REM they can actually write some pretty catchy hooks, but by and large it's all a bit too correct and sensible for my palate. Incidentally, they're playing Pearl Street in Northampton on Nov.4, and the under-21 show is sponsored by WMUA. Spread the word.

Finally this week, from local label Rykodisc, we have a new Mission of Burma double compilation album. Hot on the heels of their latest offering, Forget, this retrospective includes most of the stuff from the band's two mega-LPs, Vs and The Horrible Truth about Burma, as well as some previously unreleased material. For the uninitiated, Mission sounds like the early Fall doused in gasoline and casually ignited with a dead cigarette. Apparently they used to play so loud that lead singer Roger Miller's eardrums imploded and he is now completely tone-deaf. Groovy or what? Well, that wraps it up for this week. Next week—the lowdown on what's currently hip and happening down under.

Page's solo proves he's still got it . . . and Plant doesn't

By CHRIS PARCELLIN
Collegian Correspondent
Jimmy Page—Outrider
Geffen Records

Crank up your stereo! Former Led Zeppelin guitarist Jimmy Page has just released his first solo album, titled Outrider. It is a return to his blues-metal roots after two rather shaky albums with The Firm. The results are definitely mixed. Page recruited Jason Bonham (son of John, the late Led Zeppelin drummer) to play on this album, and he follows in his father's footsteps bu supplying Page with a relentless backbeat. Page himself serves up a smorgasbord of gritty, raunchy blues riffs.

Unfortunately, the three singers that Page uses have some nagging flaws. Former Zeppelin screamer Robert Plant just can't hit the high notes anymore. His sole appearance on the album is on a song aptly named "The Only One". Even Page's studio wizardry is not enough to save Plant, who sounds as though he graduated from the Olivia Newton-John School of Inept Singing, from embarrassing himself.

Many have wondered if Page himself was, indeed, washed-up, judging from his lackluster performance at the recent Atlantic Records 40th Anniversary celebration, plus the stiff-sounding albums with The Firm. Somehow Page has managed to wake up enough to produce this very entertaining album. He displays a fiery energy which had been missing since his glory days. Side one opens with two fantastic rockers, "Wasting My Time" and "Wanna Make Love". These two cuts feature tough vocals by journeyman crooner John Miles, who, unlike Plant, can belt out the words with manic, bluesy abandon. Page responds with searing, brainmelting guitarwork.

The cat isn't the only thing to kill in sick book

By DEREK LEIF

How to Kill Your Girlfriend's Cat
By Dr. Robert Daphne
Doubleday
$4.95

I'll get to the reviewing part of this review in a few lines; first, a brief lecture on sick humor.

When conventional humor works, we laugh, chuckling at the ideas we read or see, admiring the charm of the piece. Sick humor is another matter. When sick humor works, we don't laugh at the ideas themselves so much as the creative — if wayward — mind of the person who thought them up.

When conventional humor fails, we shrug and call it unfunny.

When sick humor fails, we not only call it unfunny, but tasteless as well. Without creativity — and a writer of sick humor needs more than any other— we begin to suspect that the author may be a lot more serious about his ideas than any of us would care to be; besides feeling disappointed and repulsed, we begin to feel a little scared.

Which is all to say: sick humor without humor is merely sick.

How to Kill Your Girlfriends Cat should be hysterical. The concept is amusing, in a sick way: relationships become strained because of the g cat, and severe measures are in order. Fine. Great idea. Now all we need are some methods of feline disposal that make us laugh and say "this is so sick, but d—, it's clever."

Well, we get 45 of them. That's 46 less than Simon Bond gave us a couple of years ago when he turned us on to the sick concept of recycling dead cats in creative ways. Still, 45 acts of cruelty for $4.95 is a bargain, and all of them are indeed cruel. If any of them showed the slightest bit of creativity, then perhaps they'd even be a little funny now and then.

The problem is that most of this book reads as if it was dashed off in a few minutes. Among the ways Daphne suggests of killing your cat (all accompanied with poor drawings): "Catnip O.D.," "Eichmann the Cat Groomer," "Breed a Big Mouse." Sick? Yes; any form of animal cruelty is pretty sick. Funny? Well, no.

Sick humor isn't for everybody, but failed humor — especially failed sick humor— isn't for anybody, including me. How to Kill Your Girlfriend's Cat certainly wasn't for me, and I kind of hope for your sake that it's not for you, either.

Andres landscapes light up Wheeler Gallery til Sunday

By REBECCA MORRISSEY
Collegian Correspondent

"There is something very distinctive about the landscapes here, because if you go in almost any direction, it changes right away," said Northampton artist Mark Andres whose works are now showing in Wheeler Gallery.

Andres, who graduated from Williams College in 1981 after studying art in Boston and painting in Germany, said he came back to the area because of its unique and beautiful landscapes.

All of the works on display now were done in the area this past spring and summer, which is why, Andes said, he wanted them to be shown locally. People here "have a certain feel for the land," he said.

Most of the paintings in the show are dominated by the color blue which people tend to associate with sadness or depression, but Andres' works are neither. The colors are combined with soft shades of pink, red, green and yellow and although they are different individually, some seeming dark or disturbing and others full of light or mellow, together they appear to lend the room a feeling of peaceful energy.

The framing is also unique in that all of the paintings are enclosed in identical simple wooden frames which work well by allowing the paintings to speak for themselves as they hang on the plain white walls of the gallery. And what they are about is not always evident.

"I'm very much against naturalistic paintings," Andres said. "That's why the paintings are painted that way. They aren't about objects or places. They are about feelings about those objects or places. A painting should be like a living thing. It should change as the viewer changes."

Andres said he has sometimes gone back to a painting and find "faces in trees and things. Ambiguous effects . . . is it a head? Is it a tree? They look very strange. To look at (a painting) up close it becomes about paint. From a distance, it is about feelings and the landscape."

Phrases such as "Raisins and Honey," "Tuesday, a Day Without Tradition" and "In the Mirror It's Sunday" seem strange titles for landscapes, but Andres said they have "a poetic connection, not a literal connection. It is an intuitive connection," he explained.

The week is almost over, but it would be well worth your while to see the landscapes of Mark Andres in the Wheeler Gallery berfore the show closes this Sunday. Gallery hours are Monday to Thursday 4 p.m. to 8 p.m. and Sundays from 2 p.m. to 5 p.m.

Old Jimmy just keeps barrelling along wiht his topnotch rhythm. The album's instrumentals emphasize Page's songwriting and arranging ..ess rather than his ability as a lead guitarist.

Side two is a showcase for his blues roots. Here he calls on British blues shouter Chris Farlow to howl over the smoky music. Farlow contributes some strong vocals but is out to lunch with his silly lyrics. Page makes "Prison Blues" smolder with his vast catalog of guitar tricks spilling out over the slow, pulsing beat. "Hummingbird" is also hobbled by Farlow's phony emotionalism. The album definitely harks to the 70's in terms of its sound, though it could also be said that this album lacks the more complex arrangements of albums like "Physical Graffiti". This is stripped down, bare bones rock'n'roll—no frills or window dressing.

Page has never commanded the respect accorded to Eric Clapton or Jeff Beck. Perhaps that is due to the musical prejudices of people more than a fair comparison of their relative merits. This new Page album is quite likely the best solo platter he'll ever record. Despite its glaring weaknesses, it's definitely worth a listen.

Report: AIDS drug boosts IQ

BOSTON (AP) — The widely used AIDS drug AZT significantly boosts the IQs of youngsters whose brains have been damaged by the AIDS virus, a report concluded.

The results of this research were widely publicized when presented at an international AIDS meeting in Stockholm, Sweden, in June. A detailed report on the treatment was published in Thursday's New England Journal of Medicine.

The study, conducted by Dr. Philip A. Pizzo and colleagues for the National Cancer Institute, concluded that AZT produced "consistent and dramatic improvement in symptoms."

However, the drug does not cure the disease, and children continue to die despite the treatments.

HIV, the AIDS virus which destroys the body's immune system, also damages the brain. In children, these neurological problems are particularly severe. Youngters' intelligence falls and they often lose their ability to walk and talk.

The drug AZT, also known as zidovudine of retrovir, is already the mainstay of treatment for adults with AIDS. In the latest study, doctors gave the medicine to 21 AIDS victims, who range in age from one to 12.

Of these, 62 percent had clear evidence of the brain damage caused by HIV, and every one of them improved after the treatment. Overall, IQ scores rose 15 points, and in some cases the youngsters' intelligence returned to the level it was before they contacted the disease.

The IQ of an 11-year-old boy had fallen from 99 to 71 after the start of AIDS symptoms. Within nine months of getting AZT, his IQ was back to 99.

Even those with no obvious brain damage showed increases in IQ. The doctors said this may be particularly important because it suggests that the AIDS virus may have subtle effects on youngsters' mental functions.

Man accused of murder arrested

NORTHAMPTON (AP) — A 30-year-old Chicopee man was ordered held without bail yesterday following his arrest in connection with the killing and sexual assault of a Wisconsin woman, police said.

Chicopee Police Lt. John Ferraro said Jeffery Whitman was arrested at his Chicopee apartment about 2:30 a.m. He pleaded innocent at his arraignment in Northampton District Court to charges of being a fugitive from justice and waived extradition to Wisconsin, said William Larkin, assistant district attorney.

Larkin said Whitman was sought in connection with the 1980 strangling of Anne Preimesberger, 18, of Appleton, Wisc.

He said Whitman's alleged involvement in the case came to light during an investigation by local and Wisconsin authorities in a separate rape case involving another Chicopee man, James Duquette.

Duquette pleaded guilty last week to the kidnapping and repeated rape of a 13-year-old Holyoke girl in June. He was sentenced to four concurrent life terms in prison. Both men had previously lived in Wisconsin and had been roommates in Chicopee.

"The whole thing stems from Duquette getting arrested, that's what started the ball rolling," said Larkin. "Duquette's still a suspect in this and other investigations."

Accused strangler awaits verdict

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — A Hampden Superior Court jury tried for a second day yesterday to reach a verdict in the murder trial of a Greenfield man accused of strangling his former girlfriend.

Gregory J. Martino, 33, is charged with killing Vivian Morrissey. Her body was discovered in the basement of her Turners Falls home last September by a teenage baby sitter.

The jury of nine women and three men deliberated for nearly four hours Tuesday night before being excused for the night.

In her closing arguments, Bertha Josephson, assistant district attorney, said Martino left behind a note referring to the victim's depression over household chores and his problems with her estranged husband. He also left the rope used to strangle her. He also videotaped a conversation with the woman on the day she died, she said.

But defense attorney Thomas Merrigan contended the couple had resolved their differences on the day the woman was killed.

"Remember, she invited him over the day she died," he told the jury. "One doesn't do that if one is afraid or one feels danger."

Boston University president: BU can change Chelsea schools' state

CHELSEA (AP) — Like the four other schools in this troubled district in Massachusetts, Burke Elementary is awaiting its messiah. If the savior arrives this fall, it won't be a moment too soon.

Children in this overcrowded 107-year-old, red brick and wood school eat at their desks. There is no cafeteria. The playground is unsafe because slate slides off the roof. The wooden stairs are a blatant fire hazard. What passes for an auditorium contains what passes for a library and what passes for a speech therapy room.

Test scores, graduation rates and teacher salaries all rank among the worst in the state. This impoverished district on Boston Harbor that mixes Hispanic and Southeast Asian immigrants with working-class whites spends just $2,600 per pupil. That's about $1,600 less than the national average and only $2000 more than Arkansas, the lowest spending state.

Fifty-nine percent of the district's 3,300 school children come from families where English is a second language, if spoken at all, says Superintendent Frank Herihy.

Chelsea hasn't built a new school since 1923, and buildings like Burke are inadequate.

Still others question whether it's right for a city to grant control of its schools to a private body, no matter how well intentioned.

"I don't think the school committee should turn over its authority to any private institution. Isn't that what democracy is about," said Elizabeth McBride, a member of the Chelsea School Committee.

Five miles away, John Silber, the president of Boston University, said he can change all that, and gain prestige for his university in the bargain. He has offered to manage the Chelsea school district for 10 years, transforming it into a model for urban-school renewal.

If Silber has his way, his university would administer and finance a sort of Marshall Plan for Chelsea schools. Mothers and pregnant teens would be counseled on nutrition and child rearing. Curricula would be re-vamped. New schools would be built, old ones renovated. Learning plans would be tailored to individual student. There would be after-school programs for people of all ages.

If Silber achieves even a fraction of this, it would be a national first: a private university governing a public school system, a full-scale social experiment aimed at transforming the fortunes of an entire community.

Many in Chelsea are thrilled at the prospect of a helping hand. But others, especially teachers, are bitter and mistrustful because, they say, university officials only recently saw fit to include them in discussions.

"I don't think it's extraneous to the life of a university to be caught serving the community," Silber said.

The district's biggest problem has always been money, but 1980's statewide tax-limiting Proposition 2½ hit Chelsea hard. Funds for supplies were cut in half, and music, art, physical education and counseling staff were laid off.

In other words, big questions remain before the BU-Chelsea contract is a done deal. Where is the money coming from for BU's grandiose reform plan? Who would ultimately be in charge?

Concretely and specifically, nothing has been settled. There is no contract between Chelsea and BU, said Paul Devlin, head of the Massachusetts Federation of Teachers.

The idea began three years ago when 30-year veteran school committee member Andrew P. Quigley independently approached Silber with the idea of managing Chelsea's schools. The university agreed to produce a comprehensive audit of the schools and develop a plan to revive the system.

Said Ed Greenberg, a 73-year-old retiree and civic leader who recently attended his 55th Chelsea High School reunion: "The community just doesn't have the money or the expertise to turn the schools around. This has been going on for 30 years now. Things are bad."

a grass field," said Cox, who will attend her second A camp this January at Rutgers. "So I hired a personal coach to work with me, redshirted a year, played for a season at Purdue and then was a mess when I found out the program had been dropped."

But Cox is rejuvenated once again and Hixon is cognizant of her contributions to the team.

"I'm impressed with her savability,' Hixon said. "That might sound simplistic, but Cindy has kept the ball out of the net and kept us in the game until we've been able to score. She's played consistent and gives the defense a lot of confidence."

Stability in goal is synonomous with the Minutewomen, whose defense was anchored by All-American Lynn Carlson the past four years. With the graduation of Carlson, however, the changing of the guard was in limbo, as both Cox and senior Sue Desmond vied for the starting spot between the posts.

"We're lucky to have to have two good goalies who can do the job. It helps the mentality of the team. They play more daring and take more risks," Hixon said.

From the outset, Cox knew that she wasn't guaranteed top billing. So the native of Edwardsville, Ill., who is majoring in Business Management and Psychology, set out to establish herself as UMass' Secretary of Defense.

"I knew that Sue was going to be tough competition, but I had confidence in my ability," Cox said. "I'm flexible and quick. I'm not as strong as some other goalies but I can hold my own. I know that the expectations of the team are higher than last year, but the biggest games are usually my best games."

If that holds true, then the Minutewomen will be clicking their heels at Franklin Field, the site of this year's NCAA championship. And with the brains of the scarecrow, the heart of the tin man, and the courage of the lion, one can only envision Cox leading the chant, "Take me back to Amherst."

Senior goaltender Cindy Cox has been a welcome addition to the University of Massachusetts field hockey team. The transfer from Purdue University has had an impressive start to her career as a Minutewoman, posting eight shutouts in the team's first 10 games.

Boston rallied to win the series. Henderson went on to bat .400 in the World Series loss to the New York Mets, but was traded to San Francisco midway through the next season.

Oakland's bullpen, which held Boston to three runs in 35 innings this year, did the neycutt relieved Stewart with the bases loaded and one out in the seventh and kept Boggs to a sacrifice fly. In the second, Boggs — a .373 career hitter with the bases loaded — struck out in the same situation, the first time he had fanned in 22 lifetime at-bats against Stewart.

Boggs ended the game by striking out with runners on first and second.

Dennis Eckersley, another former Boston star, finished with two shutout innings. Eckersley, who won 20 games as a starter for the Red Sox in 1978, led the majors with 45 saves this season and Oakland's bullpen had a record 64 saves.

The Athletics won the season series against Boston, 9-3 and outhomered them 13-1. Oakland again showed off its pitching and power and took a lead into Game 2 tonight, with Storm Davis going against Boston's Roger Clemens.

Stewart, a 21-game winner, was masterful through the middle innings. He retired 10 successive batters, starting with the strikeout of Boggs in the second, and had little trouble until the seventh.

Jim Rice walked with one out and Jody Reed was hit by a pitch. Rich Gedman followed with a line drive to center field and Henderson slipped and fell, but kept it to a single that loaded the bases. It was doubtful whether Henderson would have caught the ball; more likely, it would have dropped in, just like Gary Carter's winning double in Game 1 of the National League playoffs Tuesday night in Los Angeles.

Hurst, chosen to start the opener over Boston's other 18-game winner, Clemens, because of a 13-2 record at home, gave up six hits in a complete game. One of the hits was Canseco's long home run through a stiff crosswind and over the left-field wall.

Canseco led the majors with 42 home runs and 124 RBI this season. The home run brought cries of "steroids, steroids," from the fans, referring to allegations the big slugger had bulked up on the substance.

Field hockey trips NU, 1-0

Late first half goal helps Minutewomen past No. 7 Huskies

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

Somehow, the breaks just always seem to even themselves out over time.

Last Friday, the University of Massachusetts field hockey team was the victim of a bad break when an Old Dominion forward mishit a shot that found its way to the net for a game-winning goal in overtime.

Yesterday at Totman Field, the Minutewomen were the beneficiary of a good break as they scored a goal while Northeastern players were arguing with an official.

And the way things turned out, the Minutewomen needed that break very badly. It came at the end of the first half when senior co-captain Ruth Vasapolli hit sophomore Elise McDevitt with a pass right in front of the net while the Huskies were arguing with the refs.

McDevitt poked the ball past a diving NU goalie for her fifth goal of the season to give the Minutewomen a 1-0 lead with nine seconds left in the first half. Not using their heads ended up costing the Huskies the game.

The goal was the game-winner as UMass went on to win 1-0.

"It was really a mental lapse on Northeastern's part and it was a very, very smart play by us," UMass coach Pam Hixon said. "Ruthy and Elise knew the clock was running down and they (NU) were arguing with the officials, and we scored."

But that goal did not come easy. Northeastern had the UMass attack crossed up for most of the game with its zone defense that limited UMass to 15 shots on the afternoon.

"They played us for the deflections," Hixon said. "They didn't mark us as tightly as we normally are marked. They played more of a zone that took us a little while to get use to."

Bernadette Martel prepares to take a shot in yesterday's 1-0 win over seventh-ranked Northeastern at Totman Field.

The Huskies did shut down UMass for most of the game but Northeastern had its own troubles in generating offense. The Huskies play all their home games on artificial turf.

"I think it definitely effected our game," NU coach Cheryl Murtagh said. "We have to play differently on grass than we do on our home field. It definitely had an effect on our penalty corners."

The Huskies failed to convert on all 12 of their penalty corners and were only able to get nine shots off on Cox who recorded her eighth shutout of the season. Cox had seven saves for the game and a majority of them were difficult diving stops.

"Cindy gave us a couple of great saves in the first half when we really needed to keep the ball out," Hixon said. "It would have been a different story if they scored first because they just long balled us to death. They were playing for field position."

The win raises UMass' record, who came into the game ranked No. 3 in the nation and No. 1 in New England, to 9-1. The Minutewomen are now at the halfway point of a nineteen game schedule.

Northeastern dropped to 5-2-1 on the season.

There's no place like UMass for goalie Cindy Cox

By LINDA DELIVORIAS
Collegian Staff

Cindy Cox, after experiencing a Midwestern tornado, has found the yellow brick road.

The senior goalie on the UMass field hockey team, who transferred from Purdue University this semester after the Boilermakers dropped their field hockey program, is determined to reach the Land of Oz, the NCAA Final Four.

"I wanted to transfer to a program that was committed to making the Final Four," Cox said. "And when I met the team in February I noticed an off-the-field unity and closeness amongst the players that I hadn't seen at some other schools. I had a great time and knew this was an opportunity I couldn't pass up."

Cox couldn't have picked a better supporting cast, as the third-ranked Minutewomen (8-1), who were ousted in the NCAA semi-finals last year by the wicked witch of the south (North Carolina), seem destined to become the wizards of the Emerald City.

"We know we have the talent but we're just taking one game at a time,' said Cox, who has posted a 0.22 goals-against-average and .952 save percentage. "(UMass head coach) Pam (Hixon) says that if we play the way we're supposed to the result will take care of itself. Intensity and team unity wins games."

UMass revealed its intangibles in last Friday's 1-0 setback against top-ranked Old Dominion, as the final score was not indicative of the Minutewomen's all-around dominance of the Monarchs, who scored the game-ending goal in overtime.

"I was really tested in that game and I'm more confident and poised because of it," said Cox, who registered 10 saves and surrendered her second goal of the season against ODU. "I'd rather have 30 shots a game because it's tough to keep your concentration level up when you're not being challenged. It's been a hard transition adjusting to a higher level of competition."

The transitional task has become Cox's trademark, as the native of Edwardsville, Ill. toiled at Miami University of Ohio for two seasons before transferring to Purdue her junior year.

"I knew that if I wanted to make it to A (Olympic Development) Camp I had to play on turf and Miami had

Club Sports Roundup

The University of Massachusetts crew team participated in the Textile River Regatta in Lowell on Sunday. The race was a 3.5 mile timed course against schools such as Coast Guard, Boston University, the Riverside Boat Club, Union Boat Club, Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Williams College.

The varsity men's eight finished in sixth place, only 10 seconds out of third. In the women's race, the varsity eight came in second behind Boston University while the junior varsity team finished sixth.

The men's varsity lightweight eight came in second behind a strong Riverside boat. And the men's junior varsity lightweights finished second in their race. Also a men's lightweight for finished second.

All around, it was a good day for UMass in the opening regatta of the season. This week, the team competes in the Mount Holyoke Women's Regatta on Saturday and the Head of the Connecticut on Sunday.

Editor's note: The Collegian this semester is featuring the Club Sports Roundup, as a service to those club sports or teams on campus who otherwise are unable to be covered.

Men's soccer to throw Stag party

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

The Stags of Fairfield University, in town for this afternoon's matchup with the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team (4 p.m., Upper Boyden field), have scored two goals total in their first eight games this season, and have lost them all.

What do the Minutemen, winners of three straight, have to fear?

"There are alot of things going in their (Fairfield's) favor," said UMass assistant coach John Martin. "We're not getting any rest, and they're coming in between two tough games for us."

Sunday's date with Atlantic 10 rival University of Rhode Island is indeed looming large on the horizon for the Minutemen, who have upped their record to 6-4 with three wins in the last five days. In search of an invitation to post-season play, UMass will be looking to improve its standing in the Atlantic 10 (1-1 in the East, 2-1 overall) agianst the Rams on Sunday. In the meantime, the Minutemen's legs may be a little wobbly this afternoon. Their spirits, however, will be soaring following Tuesday's cathartic 3-2 win at Brown University.

The UMass squad that packed the vans on route to Providence, R.I. hadn't won a game in which the other team scored (0-4), and had yet to win on the road (0-3).

Late Tuesday night, the Minutemen returned home with a 3-2 win, having proved their ability to overcome adversity. UMass(6-4) beat not just the Bruins of Brown, but rain, road fatigue, bad luck, and their own history of playing poorly when faced with misfortune. Brown tied the score once on a garbled free kick in the final second of the first half, and again on a fluke deflection of a misdirected shot.

But when UMass' Steve Cesnek scored with ten minutes left to play to put the Minutemen on top 3-2, and goalkeeper Sam Ginzburg sealed the goal line against a mounting Bruin late surge, the Minutemen bagged themselves their most poigniant, and important, victory of the season.

"We walked off the field (Monday)in the rain feeling peeled; tired and beat," said Martin. "We really worked hard."

Resignation leaves EWC in lurch

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

The controversy surrounding a lack of counseling at the Everywoman's Center has, as of yesterday, escalated to confusion between University administrators.

The dispute has also led to predictions that the counseling service may be restored as soon as Monday.

Carol Wallace, director of EWC, said there is no counseling program available at the center at this time but there may be "some internal shuffling" to provide partial coverage.

"We have not had counseling all this semester," she said. "Now the vice chancellor wants me to fill that position, but the only way I can do that is to create another vacant program."

The coordinator of counseling at EWC, Mary Aubrey, has resigned, effective Saturday, but the reason for her absence since September is because she has been using up her accumulated vacation time and is still on payroll, Wallace said.

Dr. Gloria Deguevera, director of the division of educational access and outreach, to which EWC reports, said the lack of counseling is not because of budget cuts, but because of the program coordinator's resignation.

"Counseling is a high priority program. We're trying to do the best we can for the center [in respect to budget cuts]," said Deguevera. "But in the meantime, the counseling position has become trapped in that situation. It's a coincidence."

"The reason I did not go out to search immediately [for a replacement], is because I had to save $33,000 in budget cuts," Wallace said, adding that the cuts ordered by the University of Massachusetts for EWC include $33,000 and one full time position.

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis Madson said "It's absolutely critical that counseling services be provided. The cuts can't be made in counseling."

Wallace said there is a possibility that Mercedes Del Valle, coordinator of the Women's Administrative and General Education Support program, will take over the counseling program on a limited basis, if she accepts the job.

Duffey, Greeks urge Holyoke citizens to register

By RICHARD GORHAM
Collegian Correspondent

Voter registration for the upcoming presidential election was the theme yesterday afternoon, as more than 100 University of Massachusetts Greek Area students joined their chancellor in canvassing the streets of Holyoke.

"The right to vote is one of the most important responsibilities of an American citizen," said UMass Chancellor Joseph Duffey. "Sadly, millions are not registered and will not participate in the forthcoming elections."

The project, coordinated by Director of Greek Affairs Carlene Riccelli, was an effort to register as many new voters as possible before the Oct. 11 deadline.

"Our intention is to push for registration before the deadline," said Riccelli.

Accompanied by members of the Holyoke League of Women Voters and travelling in small groups, the students spread information about the registration process to different areas of Holyoke.

"We went around door-to-door, introduced ourselves, and asked if people had registered to vote. Most people hadn't," said Wendy Lowenfish, Chi Omega, who canvassed the downtown Holyoke area.

"There are so many people who don't realize they can be a part (of the voting process)," she said. "I hope we helped these people know they have the privilege to vote if they want to."

Riccelli said that none of the areas covered were considered dangerous to students, and the program was completed before nightfall.

Areas were targeted because they have a low percentage of adult voter registration, according to Nelson Acosta, a former Holyoke resident who now works in the the UMass admissions office. Acosta targeted the areas along with Helen Griffith of the Holyoke Registrar of Voters office.

Some of the participants were fluent in Spanish, which many of the students found to be essential in the registration effort.

"It was important (to have someone fluent in Spanish) because some of the people were fearful of speaking to anyone who didn't speak Spanish," said Kevin Taylor, Delta Upsilon, who also canvassed the downtown Holyoke area. "It was essential to help these people exercise their right to vote, and I think we were instrumental in explaining to them their rights."

The project was a joint effort of the Chancellor's Office, the Dean of Students Office, the Office of Greek Affairs, the Holyoke Registrar of Voters and the Holyoke League of Women Voters.

Census takers few; city's numbers may come up short

SPRINGFIELD — If the US Census Bureau does not hire enough workers to help count people for the 1990 census, then many citizens may be accidentally left out of the upcoming census, according to the city's Census Field Office.

"How would it feel to go to town hall to register to vote in the approaching presidential election and have the registrar say: 'I'm sorry, we only let US citizens vote in this country,'" said Amy Mittleman, office manager of the Census Field Office.

Mittleman added that the Office is looking for temporary workers for the next few weeks. "It is urgent that we get more people because we need to compile the address list in the next few weeks," she said Monday.

Mittleman said the work involves going door to door in the Springfield area to gather names and addresses for the census, which is only a little more than one year away.

The job pays $5.50 per hour, and the work is not difficult, she said. Workers are also paid 22.5 cents per mile for gas and travel expenses.

The Census Field Office is asking those interested to call 731-9846 for more information.

Tillis jazzes up FAC with style

By JOHN SWANSON
Collegian Staff

The four most Prominent items in Fred Tillis' office are a desk, an upright piano, a shelf and a large picture window facing the Fine Arts Center.

Tillis is director of the Fine Arts Center, associate provost for faculty relations, a jazz saxophonist, and a composer. He is also a professor of theory-composition, Jazz and Afro-American Music and, most recently, chairperson of the Minority Student Services Review Commission. Despite all the roles he plays, Tillis says music is still primary in his life.

PROFILE

"In about my senior year in college, I made a decision to be a writer — that is, a composer in the European classical tradition, which led me down another track — as opposed to a musician who would be a performer in the jazz tradition for his livelihood," he said.

Tillis, 54, is a native of Texas. He received his B.A. in Texas at Wiley College and his M.A. and Ph.D. at the University of Iowa and taught at Kentucky State, Grambling (La.) State University and his alma mater before coming to the University of Massachusetts in 1970.

Once here, Tillis became an associate professor in the Music Department and a composer of European classical music. He has composed over 80 pieces. In 1980, he was appointed FAC director and in 1983, he was named associate provost.

Last spring, after almost 15 years away from jazz, Tillis recorded Contrasts and Diversions with pianist/trumpeter Jeff Holmes. Tillis said that fellow UMass faculty members Billy Taylor and Max Roach encouraged him to make the recording. The return to performing made Tillis realize how much work it involves.

"In order to be an active performer, I must keep in touch with the instrument, which means I must practice daily. You cannot be an effective performer (otherwise)," he said.

European classical music, Tillis said, is what most people think of when they hear a reference to classical music. Tillis pointed out the importance of the distinction between the classical music of Europe and that of other nations, since the music of Bach or Beethoven differs greatly from the music of India, Korea or China.

Jazz, he said, is America's form of classical music, because "it has been here long enough, it is recognized all over the world, identified as something characteristic of this country."

Dukakis lauds running mate's performance:'It's a real plus'

LONE STAR, Texas (AP) — Michael Dukakis yesterday jubilantly called running mate Lloyd Bentsen's debate performance "a real plus" for the Democrats, and said Republican Dan Quayle was "extremely insecure" and "programmed beyond belief."

Dukakis, speaking to reporters on a flight from Boston to Texas, praised Bentsen as "knowledgeable (and) relaxed" during the vice presidential debate Wednesday night. Once again, he questioned George Bush's judgment in selecting Quayle for the GOP ticket.

"The caliber of the people that you pick is absolutely the single most important thing you do in this business," Dukakis said.

"Lloyd Bentsen (was) solid, thoughtful, strong. He sounded like someone who belonged in the vice presidency. This is a real plus for us," he said.

The Democratic nominee said he expected Bush to defend Quayle's work against Bentsen, "but I don't think anyone believes it."

"Frankly," he said, "I think a lot of what Mr. Bush is saying these days is wearing thin."

The Massachusetts governor said Bentsen demonstrated command of the issues and showed he would challenge the president during major policy discussions. The same cannot be said of Quayle, Dukakis said.

"I didn't get any sense that he's going to have the capacity or the ability to do that or the will to do it or, for that matter, the knowledge," Dukakis said.

"It was very disturbing" he said of Quayles performance.

"I thought he was programmed beyond belief... extremely insecure, this fellow. He didn't have a sense of strength or control or anything. ... Thinking about Quayle being a heartbeat away from the presidency, to watch that, I think, is very, very troubling."

EPA fines pool company $99G

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP) — The Environmental Protection Agency has reportedly levied the first penalty of its kind in fining a pool supply company $99,000 for failing to notify agencies of a June chlorine fire that routed 25,000 people from homes and businesses.

The Northeast administrator for the EPA, Michael R. Deland, said Wednesday that the penalty was the first in the nation assessed for violations of the EPA's community right-to-know law, enacted in 1986.

Springfield Mayor Richard Neal vowed to press the pool supply company until the city recovered 620,000 spent in fighting and cleaning up the fire. Neal said Wednesday that the money spent on the emergency could add 50 cents to the city's tax rate.

I'm determined to get that money," Neal said. "We'll obviously seek damages from their insurance company, and if they don't have insurance, we'll seek it from them."

Deland said All Chemical Labs Inc., which does business as Advanced Laboratories, was fined $25,000 plus $500 a day for failing to provide officials with a written report immediately after the June 17 accident.

He said the company was also fines 25,000 for failing to notify the National Response Center, the nation's emergencies, when the troubles began at the plan.

A minor fire at the plant was controlled on the morning of June 17, but firefighters were called back to the scene that night when a police officer spotted flames inside the building.

The subsequent blaze, fed by thousands of exploding barrels of chloride tablets, took four days to come under control. At its height, it sent up a cloud of poisonous chlorine gas three miles long, 100 feet high and four blocks wide.

More than 200 people were treated at local hospitals for minor injuries form the fumes and officials estimated that 180,000 gallons of chlorine leaked.

"In light of the magnitude of the release and its impact on the Springfield community, EPA considers the violations particularly gregarious," Deland said.

William Hadley, attorney for the company, said it will probably contest the fine and he questioned its severity, maintaining the EPA "in reality knew about this leak from the start."

He also said the city must prove the company was negligent before it can collect damages, although the EPA fine is based only on the company's failure to provide a written report to date on what chemicals had spilled, how much had been released and other information.

Exploding Sprite bottle shakes tower residents

By THOMAS RODRIGUES
Collegian Staff

An explosive device was set off on the 11th floor of John Adams Residence Hall on Wednesday, burning a three inch diameter hole in the blue carpet of the hallway in front of room 1110.

Students present on the floor at the time said they heard a loud bang at about 12:45 p.m. and opened their doors to find clouds of odorous fumes billowing from a plastic Sprite bottle.

"The container exploded and sprayed brown stuff all over my door. I waited about 30 seconds and then opened my door. It smelled a lot out there," said sophomore 11th floor resident Melissa McPherson outside of whose room the device had combusted.

Floor occupants originally thought the device had been filled with excrement, but later revised their opinions, saying it could have contained sulfer causing the odor.

The UMass Environmental Health and Safety Department reported that the device caused smoke and a small fire, but residents say there wasn't any fire.

Police are investigating the incident and witnesses say they saw one, possibly two suspicious individuals 'making something' in one of the bathrooms. It is also rumored that a second device was set off on a lower floor half an hour later, but the report could not be confirmed.

In other incidents:

- A Jenson car stereo worth $150 was stolen from a vehicle parked in the Fraternity/Sorority parking lot Wednesday.
- An accident occurred on Massachusetts Ave. Wednesday when a vehicle traveling east on that street attempted to take a left turn at Lincoln St. colliding with another vehicle in doing so. Both vehicles received damage in excess of $1000 and one of the vehicles operators was cited for failure to use care in turning.

BOG reforms bylaws, approves appointees

By GEORGE FRANCY
Collegian Staff

At a smooth Board of Governors meeting last night, five committees were set up, and several bylaw changes were made.

Members of the space, executive, budgets, building operations, and program councils were approved by the board. The committees handle the functions of the board for which they are named.

A bylaw concerning the board's ability to condemn and commend, and another about the requirements for appointees to the board were rescinded last night.

With the removal of the first bylaw, the board effectively made it easier to condemn or commend any group. The rescinded bylaw had required an ad-hoc committee to be formed to study the condemnation or commendation of something. This committee would then have to report to the board, and the proposal would have to receive a three-fourths majority vote to pass.

The other rescinding was a bylaw that set the fourth Thursday of each month as a "work session" for the committees. Gov. Jay Festa said the work session rule had never been enforced, and was not needed.

The meeting itself ran without the internal bickering that had been a part of previous board gatherings.

Commenting on this, Treasurer Joe Casali said, "It's the best board I've ever seen, and I've been here three years."

"The officers have a lot to do with it because we're not carbon copies of each other, we each add something," Casali said.

He admitted the board had been partisan in the past, and this had hampered the effectiveness of the body.

"[Chairperson Eric Nakajima] has a way of getting people involved, and the coordinators have been very good," Casali said. Coordinators are paid by the board who work on different aspects of the Campus Center/Student Union.

The BOG also postponed consideration of two motions.

The first motion would require appointees of a residential area government to live in the area they are appointed from. The move also stipulates that vacancies of at-large seats on the board would be appointed by the Student Government Association President's Office.

This motion is apparently to control appointments made when seats are left open between elections.

This last move requires a change in the BOG Constitution, which automatically tables it for one week.

Finally, the board sent a proposal for the installation of dart boards to the Building Operations Committee.

■ Tillis

Since he has dealt with so many forms of music, Tillis said he doesn't have a favorite.

"I am so steeped in at least two main streams of music – that is in the European classical tradition and jazz – that I don't like one better than the other," he said. "I will say this however: I have made a decision to concentrate on performing in the jazz tradition and writing in the European classical tradition."

Tillis said the jobs of composer and conductor separated in the 19th century, making each profession that of a "specialist."

"It's probably a healthier thing (for a musician) to keep involved in both camps," he said

His love for the arts helps Tillis in his other jobs as well.

"My being involved as the director of the Fine Arts Center at least helps me to try to communicate my deep convictions about how important the arts are to a larger university community," he said.

And how important does he consider the arts?

"I believe that the arts communicate something to the world that is needed. In other words, they show a humanizing side of the adventures of humankind," he said. "It is a peculiarity of a human being to want something other than material comforts. All animals seek shelter, food and so forth, but the human being also seeks something to reflect either their soul or their feelings and expressions, which are a little bit different."

Many recruits unqualified for state police training

SPRINGFIELD (AP) – A lawyer for state troopers whose police class was hit by illness in its first week said yesterday that fitness tests showed many of the recruits were unqualified for the demanding training.

"At least half of those tested did not meet state police requirements," said Timothy M. Burke, an attorney for the State Police Association of Massachusetts.

Burke said he studied the physical fitness test scores of Agawam Academy recruits who entered the 14-week classes beginning Sept. 19. At least 16 recruits from the class of 50 were hospitalized with dehydration and exhaustion by the end of the first week of class.

The cadets were recruits from municipal police forces throughout Western Massachusetts and were required by state law to attend the academy so they would be uniformly trained.

Burke acknowledged that state police requirements are more stringent than those for municipal police forces. He declined to specify the state police physical requirements. "I can't give you that in 25 words or less," he said.

He said the cadets' test results were released to him by the state Department of Public Safety and the Criminal Justice Training Council, which runs the academy, in response to a freedom of information request. He declined to give details on the results, citing the cadets' confidentiality privileges.

Aides to Gary Egan, director of the Criminal Justice Training Council, referred all questions on the council's physical tests and requirements to the state Department of Public Safety. Spokesmen at the department did not return two telephone calls.

Also Thursday, the Union-News of Springfield reported that records from the Agawam Fire Department showed at least nine cadets from the academy's 11 previous classes were taken by ambulance to area hospitals. The classes average 50 cadets, former cadets have said.

And the speaker of the Massachusetts House appointed 11 lawmakers to a special investigative panel, giving them until Dec. 31 to report back on training practices at the Agawam police academy.

The order filed yesterday by House Speaker George Keverian, D-Everett, said the panel's investigation would look into training methods at regional an municipal police schools "with special emphasis on the facilities and qualifications of instructors at the Criminal Justice Training Center" in Agawam.

Keverian said the investigation would not cover the same ground as a probe by the state attorney general's office into the cause of the illnesses.

A third group set up to investigate the academy's training practices, this one by Gov. Michael Dukakis, met for the first time yesterday behind closed doors.

John Callahan, a former district attorney who heads the panel, said after the meeting that "there were some things panel members needed to get off their chests" in private. He denied the closed meeting was in violation of the states' open meeting law.

Like the legislative panel, the governor's panel has been charged with evaluating the academy's training standards and recommending improvements rather than looking into the cause of the illnesses. Among it 15 members are several doctors, police chiefs and legislators.

Callahan said the committee divided into sub-panels to explore various matters and agreed to meet again in two weeks.

A recruit who collapsed the first day of class at the Agawam academy, Sept. 19, emerged from his coma to listen to the American League baseball championship series on the radio, his family said yesterday.

Pittsfield Mayor Anne Everest Wojtkowski said the family told her Timothy Shepard, 25, of Pittsfield also winked at his wife Wednesday and responded to questions by nodding his head.

Special Olympics begin qualifying meet tomorrow

The Olympics may have ended in Seoul, but don't tell that to some people in Florence.

A Special Olympics soccer qualifying tournament is scheduled for 10 a.m. tomorrow at the John F. Kennedy Middle School in Florence.

The Hampshire County Special Olympics is scheduled to host 16 teams that will compete in the Western Massachusetts Soccer Qualifying Tournament.

"Let me win, but if I cannot win let me be brave at the attempt," said George Perry, manager of the Special Olympics Greater Hampshire area, when he cited the nation-wide motto that is recited before every event.

"There is a tremendous sense of accomplishment," said Cathy Sherrill, volunteer spokeswoman, about how the olympians feel when they complete events she described as "really uplifting."

The Special Olympics was designed to give people who are mentally retarded an opportunity for self-development.

"Everybody is a winner," Perry said, adding that the athletes are able to learn new skills, express their courage, and experience a joy they get from participating as part of a group.

Perry said anyone who knows athletes who can participate in this area should notify him.

For more information about becoming a volunteer, call George Perry at 584-0256.

"If I move Mercedes to counseling, [WAGES] will immediately become vacant," Wallace said.

"It's a very complex situation," said Deguevera. "We are taking every possible step to prevent from having the counseling program completely uncovered."

If Del Valle declines the position, the search for a new coordinator will take at least two months, Deguevera said.

"It needs to be a professional who is taking care of counselees. We need a therapist – we can't put just anybody in the position," she said.

Notes from the Campus Center basement

Some new sources of news and some sub-station blues

There are far too many good reasons to watch television this fall. No reasonable professor could object to a couple hours watching an important event of vast political importance (ie. the Olympics) or an interesting, if meaningless, symbolic struggle (ie. the debates). Of course, some of us are taking seriously the contest for the soul of the nation, and are watching each step carefully. I predict the Sox in six.

Nancy Klingener

Speaking of Sox, any student who was here two years ago remembers a special agony, completely different from the Buckner Ball. We remember the anger and violence that followed the World Series, that put UMass in the spotlight for racial tension. That racial tension was real, and still exists, and if the Sox are in it again, a lot of people will be watching this campus. Perhaps we could show that we are students, good students — and we learned something. The heaviest burden will be on the Department of Public Safety, which is kind of sad. Yes, here we must depend on the police to enforce civil conduct. I think we can do better.

Along with the Collegian, assorted alternative publications and ad inserts, the Student Union newspaper row has another offering this week, the Massachusetts Free Press. For a first-time student publication, the University Democrat-affiliated paper looks good, with few typos and an exclusive story by noted Amherst College historian Henry Steele Commager.

One problem the Free Press shares with the Collegian is a noticeable dearth of female bylines and names on the editorial board. On the Free Press masthead, one woman is listed. At the Collegian, there are no women on the executive board and three of 10 on the board of editors. The stories are there to be written, and the women are at the University to write them. I hope female journalists are not put off by the current unbalanced ratio; I would bet both papers welcome any voice willing to speak up.

Haven't seen a Minuteman yet this year. Could it be there's trouble in right-wingdom? Rumors are flying around this newsroom that the Minuteman's season premiere features an expose of the Collegian, with "former staff member tells all." Horrors. Just remember, conservative supporters of the free market, we are the top money-making RSO on campus, without help from the administration or public taxes (or political foundations, for that matter).

A new police "sub-station" in Washington Tower, Southwest, has generated a lot of protest from Southwest residents. Okay, it's not nice to have a police station in your dorm. BUT, take it from someone who picks up the police log everyday, the vast majority of incidents requiring police action are in Southwest. This isn't the students' fault — for one thing, it's the biggest residential area on campus, and for another, whoever designed 22-story towers for college students was thinking about packing them in, not living conditions. Washington does seem to be unfairly singled out, though — why not put the police in a more neutral location, like a dining commons?

The UMass cops are not out to get Southwest residents or anyone else. They probably took these jobs because they like this school — and they've taken more abuse than anyone ever should, anywhere. If students (not just residents of Southwest) don't cross the line, they won't have any problems with the police. It's true the administration in general is tougher about alcohol rules now. It's also true, and always has been, that if you are halfway cool about your drinking, and not destructive or obnoxious, you'll have no problem with the police.

Some advice for Mike and George

Letters to George and Mike

Dear George:

I saw the debate Wednesday. Frankly, every fear I had of your vice-presidential choice came true. Dan Quayle? Why, George? When there were so many others so much more qualified, why did you choose Dan Quayle?

The man was laughed at Wednesday, George.

David R. Mark

He was laughed at for proposing he had an environmental record, which he doesn't. He was shamed by Lloyd Bentsen when he tried, unsuccessfully, to compare himself to John Kennedy.

He looked like he couldn't remember his script.

He looked like he was going slow to use up time, because he wasn't able to use his time more constructively to respond to questions.

Bentsen didn't even take advantage of Quayle confusing our federal deficit with our being a debtor nation.

I guess the problem I had while I watched Quayle Wednesday was that, though he wasn't his normal hyperactive, silly little self, he still came across as unvice-presidential. His answers were so metered, and his responses so scripted, that I find it hard to believe he has any brains under those pretty-boy looks.

At least when Bentsen spoke, probably from the same script, he came across as knowledgeable, understanding, and occasionally, fatherly. I guess he shares that quality with Ronald Reagan — I felt comfortable with him as the choice of the Duke, despite their differences of opinion.

In contrast, Quayle didn't appear comfortable with the information he presented, and didn't seem to want to stray from a very narrow set of facts.

And then there was that yarn he tried to spin about the common sense his grandmother taught him.

I hate to say it, but Quayle had such a hard time getting through the story, I have a hard time believing it was actually his. Then the suggestion by Quayle that the theme of the story "If you try your best, you can get anything accomplished," was solely a Republican virtue — is ridiculous.

It's getting harder and harder for me to seriously consider voting for the two of you.

Dear Mike:

You got a break there on Wednesday. Your campaign is not going to crash in the polls just yet. But if you don't get on your horse and hammer Bush harder, you're destined to lose.

Bentsen came across in good shape during the debate. You have to use that to your benefit. Stress the importance of Bentsen, a man who could very easily be the president, compared to "Danny" who is best suited for mowing the White House lawn.

And where is the commercial, ala Hubert Humphrey, that has people laughing at the notion of "President Quayle?" Put some guys in a bar, guzzling a few brewskies, trying not to wet their pants as Dan Quayle fumbles through his speech.

All the elements are there to put you in the White House. Your opponent is always capable of sticking his foot in his mouth, and his vice-presidential candidate is trying to take his foot out. Now do something!

Duke a better deal

Kudos to Collegian columnist Peter Leon and his account of last Sunday's presidential candidate debate (The debate: more than a mudfight, Sept. 29). Leon was right on the mark with comments about Republican candidate George Bush and his failure to label Democratic candidate Mike Dukakis as a "Massachusetts liberal" or as unpatriotic.

Clearly, Dukakis projected himself as the competent candidate. Although perhaps not in JFK's league in dealing with the press, he established himself during the debate with a quiet confidence that spells leadership. He looked Presidential.

In contrast, Bush came across as a favorite uncle. A little clumsy, a bit of a stumblebum, but a nice guy overall. Bush didn't say much of substance, but then he wasn't trying to debate issues, rather he was attempting to paint Dukakis as a far out leftist.

Bush has suddenly had to separate himself from Reagan and take on issues by himself. Granted, its not all his fault. After all, he has been Reagan's yes-man for the last eight years.

The knock on Dukakis is that he has no personality. A minor and superficial point in politics. If our president was elected because of personality, then Bill Cosby or Michael J. Fox should run. What Dukakis does have is proven leadership in government. Dukakis's technocratic efficiency is clearly preferable to Bush's folksy incompetence.

Regardless of the outcome in the upcoming election, the Democratic party is the party of the future. If Bush happens to capture the White House in November, it will turn out to be a blessing in disguise. The Republican term with Bush as President will be a Hobbesian nightmare; "solitary, poor, nasty, brutish, and short." The 1992 election will thus be a landslide victory for the Democratic party.

Dukakis will lead the United States into a bright future. Bush will continue the Reagan legacy; the White House lights will be on, but nobody will be home.

Nuclear reactors definitely do more harm than good for the planet

Regarding Melissa Dobosz's editorial, ("More good than harm comes form nuclear power," Oct. 3), I must say I agree with several of her assertions, particularly that energy issues are not a priority and that consumption of fossil fuels must be minimized in order to halt the greenhouse effect.

I believe Ms. Dodosz is misinformed if she believes nuclear power is an "obvious" alternative. She seems concerned with enviornmental protection; that she is a proponent of nuclear power surprises me.

Uranium, plutonium, and tritium (the primary waste products generated by nuclear reactors) are radioactive, highly unstable elements which, in microscopic amounts, promote the growth of cancer cells in human beings. They have half-lives of between 35,000 and 85,000 years; "half-life" refers to the amount of time it takes for these elements to decompose by half (emitting radioactive contaminants all the while). They can be easily converted at special plants into weapon-grade materials to manufacture nuclear bombs.

The Department of Energy, established by President Carter to oversee the conservation of natural resources and development of alternative technologies, was changed under the Reagan Administration into an organization which oversees the manufacture of nuclear weapons.

There is no way to generate nuclear power that doesn't produce radioactive waste. There is no way to dispose of it safely.

The U.S. government is currently examining sites for a giant nuclear-waste repository. These sites are located in the Texas Panhandle (some of the richest farm soil in our country), a desert in Nevada (where water tables are already poisoned by underground testing of nuclear weapons), and Northern California (on the San Andreas fault.)

I agree with Ms. Dobosz. The United States' dependence on foreign sources of oil is unsound. The "obvious" solution seems to me to redesign existing structures to utilize hydro-electric and solar power, both of which are relatively inexpensive (or free) and completely safe, inexaustable sources of energy. Those who say this would be "impractical" will soon find themselves wishing they'd had more foresight and patience.

Crystal and King sparkle in 'Memories of Me'

By ADAM CAMPBELL
Collegian Correspondent

Somewhere along the line, Hollywood seems to have developed the questionable notion that the average American filmgoer's I.Q. changes with inverse proportion to the number of leaves on the trees. Full and green means Rambo and Roman numerals. Bald and brown begets brains. Welcome to fall.

THE SCREENING ROOM

Memories of Me is a nicely acted father-and-son drama starring Billy Crystal and Alan King. It was thoughtfully directed by Henry ("The Fonz") Winkler, an alumnus of the increasingly prolific "Happy Days"/"Laverne & Shirley" School for the Performing Arts (which also gave us Penny "Big" Marshall and Ron "Willow" Howard).

The story revolves around the non-relationship between heart-surgeon Crystal and his father (Alan King), who is employed as a full-time film extra. After suffering a stress-related stroke and a jarring flashback vision of his father, Crystal flies to Hollywood in a valiant effort to resolve the issues between them. Father and son's quality time is, unfortunately, limited in quantity, and for reasons far more grave than King's varied and time-consuming portrayals of vengeful lobsters and garden vegetables (in the fictional film, Surf & Turf). He is, in fact, fatally ill, and Crystal must break free of his own reluctance and hostility to be at last a true son to his neglectful, but repentent, father.

It is a refreshing subject. Only one other film comes to mind (though, no doubt, there are more) with a similar theme. Nothing in Common, with Tom Hanks and Jackie Gleason, also dealt with the long-overdue resolution of conflicts between a father and his adult son. (I confess I didn't see that one, so I can't come up with any insightful comparisons.)

Anyway, see it. It's a good movie. It's not perfect. For one thing, it's utterly predictable. It's also less than subtle. Alan King gives an outstanding performace, at times heartbreaking.

Billy Crystal plays well against him (and there is even a certain resemblance between the two, if you squint). Memories of Me starts Friday at the Mountain Farms Cinema.

Briefly: I attended the opening weekend of the Museum of the Moving image in Queens, New York, a few weeks ago. If you're in the area, I would recommend dropping by, but it's certainly not worth making a special trip (it's part of Astoria's Kaufman Studios, if that rings a bell). The most notable part of that experience was a rare showing of an original 35mm Technicolor print of The Wizard of Oz. (Trivia: In what scene does the Tin Man hold a gun?)

Also, Warner Brothers has released, at long last, for mass consumption, two new Daffy Duck animated shorts. Both "The Duxorcist" and "Night of the Living Duck" are incorporated into the new compilation film, Daffy's Quackbusters.

Ray Charles wows a Fine Arts Center crowd

By JENNIFER DEMPSEY
Collegian Staff

Ray Charles played for a group of intimate friends last night — about 2500 of them in a sold out Concert Hall show at the Fine Arts Center.

Feet flailing and bouncing on his piano bench, the 58-year old father of jazz and blues presented the "Ray Charles Show '88," complete with five Raelettes and a 17-man orchestra to an adoring audience who left him with a standing ovation.

"Now just stop 'til I find the mike," Charles told his band as he sat down to the small black piano at the front of the stage to begin the show. "You have to bear with these things you know."

Bear with him they did as Charles played a set of soul, blues and jazz including the legendary "Georgia On My Mind" and "I Can't Stop Loving You."

It was hard to tell who was having the most fun during a rocking jazz version of "Some Enchanted Evening" and "You Don't Know," as Charles slid across his seat and kicked his feet almost up to the piano's keyboard.

Charles slowed the pace a bit and said "I'm going to invite a bit of femininity up here," and introduced the Raelettes.

The five women clad in gold dresses danced and sang Supreme-style to such old disco classics "Knock On Wood" and "I Want Your Love" and added a gospel touch to Charles' other hits.

Charles wailed, whispered and humored his crowd from beginning to end and when he told the audience "I just thought whatever I said, I'd like you to say it too. Now don't be bashful . . . ain't nobody here but us. Now repeat after me" — they were all his.

Following the short lesson in scale exercises, Charles stood up waving and smiling and bid his cheering friends goodnight. And true to his reputable humility, Charles refused an encore.

The man who has been an international musical and humanitarian star since the early 60s proved he still has what it took to gain 10 Grammys, several gold records, a star on the Hall of Fame and the 1976 label "Man of the Year."

Opening the "Ray Charles Show '88" was special guest Leroy Jenkins and his band Sting.

The world-renowned violinist, composer and arranger led his five man, one woman band in a set of avant garde, free form jazz numbers. The New York musician has been a member of the historical Association for the Advancement of Creative Musicians before founding the Revolutionary Ensemble in 1970.

A look at galleries around the valley

By KATHERINE T.LAMOTHE
Collegian Staff

Here's a special column dedicated to listing the art galleries on campus. Since I don't know about all of the galleries off campus, and information about these galleries is pretty scarce anyway, let's content ourselves to what we have here. Note: not all of the galleries on campus could be contacted for information. If any galleries want to send information for this column, send it to me at 113 Campus Center. On we go.

ArtReps, 90 Conz Street, Northampton (585-5134). This is an exception in the fact that it's off-campus and that it isn't a gallery. It's an agency which helps artists in press releases, visiting galleries and other details. They've been helping artists show their works in such venues as Zone Art Center in Springfield and Sotheby's in New York. In fact, ArtReps is helping an artist with a show at the Albion Bookstore in Noho. More information next week.

Hampden Art Gallery, Hampden Student Center, Southwest Residential Area (545-2803 or 545-2804). An art gallery in a dining commons? It could only be the Hampden Art Gallery. According to Tania Robiro, spokesperson for the Residential Arts Program, this venue, which is divided into a section for paintings, sculpture, etc. and a section for performance art, presents works from artists from the University, New England and New York. Emerging artists are also featured, Robiro said. The gallery is open Monday-Friday, 3-7 p.m. and Sunday 2-5 p.m.

Student Union Art Gallery, Box 19, University of Massachusetts (545-0792). If you thought that the University Gallery was the oldest art gallery on campus, you're wrong. The Student Union Art Gallery has been active since 1957 and is run by students for students (for the most part the art that is shown there is done by students). The hours are Monday-Friday, 11 a.m.-4 p.m.

University Gallery, Fine Arts Center (545-3670).
Opened in 1975, the University Gallery shows its regular collection of 20th century American works on paper, as well as showing special shows with contemporary art. The University Gallery is also responsible for the public sculpture in such unusual areas on campus as the Campus Pond and the stairs to the Fine Arts Center (that's right, they're the ones who put the "burnt french fry"there). The Gallery is open Tuesday-Friday, 11:30 a.m.-4:30 p.m. and Saturday-Sunday, 2-5 p.m.

Wheeler Gallery, Wheeler Residence Hall (545-0422).
First, a gallery in a dining commons. Now, a gallery in a dorm? Yes, that's Wheeler Gallery. Its purpose is to provide the average student, who's not involved with UMass' arts program, with the visual arts community. Wheeler only shows two types of exhibits: work relating to a specific event in the community, or work by a student artist. These restrictions help the average student make contact with the arts community.
Well, that's it for the list. See you next week.

The pair that he is referring to includes Margarite Poteau and Kristin Janowsky. Rudy also liked the looks of center/forward Britton Arico, who he says is very skillful and works well under pressure, and stopper Kim Prutting, who is a member of the National Team pool. In addition, the Huskies have a very solid midfield, according to Rudy.

"They're an explosive team. They can really strike it when they're in open shooting position. These girls can hit," Rudy said.

Despite the fact that this will be the biggest game of the year so far for UMass, Rudy believes his team will be up for it.

"I like our chances. It will be a good game, and it's the New England match-up," Rudy said. "But this is our test."

Sidelines: Seniors Beth Roundtree and Cathy Cassady and sophomore Sue Gaudette are all nursing injuries, but could be available for action tomorrow . . . For the first time in a week, UMass will be playing on more than a day's rest. "I'm going through withdrawal from not playing," Rudy joked.

Catanzaro, a sophomore, is a first-team Mid Atlantic Regional All-American who has scored 11 goals and two assists. Seniors Deb Minzola (3, 2) and Maria Dorando (2, 4) have also provided added spark to the Temple attack.

Defensively, the Owls are anchored by sophomore goaltender Jill Marple, who has appeared in all nine games for Temple. She has recorded 90 saves and has allowed 14 goals.

"She's a very aggressive goaltender, she comes way out," Hixon said.

For UMass, senior goalie Cindy Cox should get the call. Cox has appeared in all 10 of the Minutewomen's games. She has allowed just two goals and stopped 47 shots and also leads the A-10 in goalkeeping with her 0.20 goals against average.

The change of scenery from Philadelphia, PA to West Chester, PA will be a big one for UMass. Sunday's game should be played at a much slower pace.

"We'll be on AstroTurf against Temple and then back to grass against West Chester," Hixon said. "That will be difficult."

The Golden Rams, were 4-5 before yesterday's game with Princeton.

West Chester does not have an explosive goal scorer. Senior midfielder Audrey Asslerbach leads the team with two goals and three assists. She is followed by senior forward Lori Criswell, who has netted three goals and dished out one assist.

Shelley Stevens handles the goaltending duties for the Golden Rams. In nine games, Stevens has made 103 saves and has given up 14 goals.

"They started off dismally in their first eight games," Hixon said. "I look at West Chester very similarly to the way we were last year, getting going. They're playing progressively stronger teams and they're getting progressively better scores."

But right now, next to Old Dominion University and the University of North Carolina, the Minutewomen have to be considered the hottest team in the country.

One overtime goal in the ODU game is what separates them from being undefeated.

Led by senior Tonia Kennedy's 10 goals and one assist, junior Kathy DeAngelis (6, 3), and the play off the bench of sophomore Elise McDevitt (5, 0), UMass will look to extend its two-game winning streak this weekend.

■ men's soccer downs Stags, ready for U.R.I.

Freshman fullback Dan Lawrence wandered into foreign territory to pick up the final goal of the contest (and his first of the season) 5:32 into in the second half. Skiba started the ball directly at the left post on a long distance free kick, where it found its way through the defense of the Stags and onto the left foot of Lawrence, who redirected the ball across the goal line.

With the game in hand (and the temperature dropping through the little glass bulb at the bottom of the thermometer) Gettler seized the opportunity to warm up some fresh legs. The Minutemen have played four games in the last six days, including a grueling 3-2 win at Brown in Monday's rain.

"They (starters) got four goals while they were on. . .it gave us a real chance to play the other guys," said Gettler. "It was nice to get a little bit of a rest."

Two weeks ago, UMass hit the highway for an important three game swing fresh off a 4-0 win over St. Joseph's, "firing on all cylinders," in the words of head coach Jeff Gettler. UMass then broke down on the road, limping home with with three consecutive losses under the hood.

The Minutemen now find themselves back to the future, heading into the Ocean State for Sunday's date with Rhode Island (0-1-1 in the A-10 East) with plenty of momentum, and even more incentive. The Minutemen will be looking to improve on their 1-1 record within the division. Both squads trail undefeated Temple (2-0).

"Rhode Island is the biggest," said Gettler. "We must win."

Clemens and Davis made the two highest-scoring teams in the AL look feeble through five innings, each allowing only one hit.

The Red Sox broke through for two unearned runs in the sixth, aided by Dave Henderson's error, but Canseco and Mark McGwire helped Oakland rally for a 3-2 lead in the seventh.

Henderson, the former Boston playoff hero who singled home the winning run in Game 1 on Wednesday, led off the sixth with a single. Canseco, who homered in Game 1, then sent a 0-2 fastball high into leftfield screen to tie it 2-2. It was Canseco's third career homer among seven hits in 24 at-bats against Clemens of its offense, led by senior quarterback Dave Palazzi.

Palazzi, who is ranked 10th in the nation (1-AA) in passing efficiency at 135.9 and total offense at 274.75 yards per game, has become a true pilot for the Minutemen.

He has completed 59 of 111 attempts for 890 yards, 8 touchdowns and 4 interceptions.

The overall strength of UMass offense was tested when neither starting fullback David Mitchell nor backup Jim Pastorick played the second half because of injuries.

"There are two ways to approach an injury," Reid said. "You can sulk and feel sorry for yourself or you can treat the injury as an opportunity for another man whose been busting his gut."

Both Mitchell and Pastorick are listed as probable for tomorrow's game. And Reid said offensive tackle Mike Barrette, an All-Conference selection last year, should see his first action of the season tomorrow.

Despite injuries, UMass is third in the nation (1-AA) in scoring offense at 37.8 points per game.

Rhode Island has struggled, but certainly hasn't been the doormat some people expected after last year's 1-10 campaign.

The Rams come in at 2-3 overall and 1-2 in the Yankee Conference. They are led by sophomore quarterback Steve Monaco (60-of-119, 750 yards, 3 touchdowns and 6 interceptions).

Reid feels their strength lies on defense.

"There has been a two-year absence of Rhode Island's defense, but they've got skill in the secondary and the No. 2 defense in the conference [319.8 yards per game]," Reid said.

And that's not the kind of talent anyone can take lightly.

with Rose.

In that year Penn State was ranked the No. 1 team in the East, and went to the nationals for the first time in the schools' history.

Since then Penn State has dominated the conference and become one of the most respected programs in the region.

"They have great players and, to me, Penn State represents what a volleyball program should be. I have a lot of respect for their coaches and their program," Ford said.

Red Sox unable to stop Oakland again

BOSTON (AP)— Rookie Walt Weiss, the ninth-place hitter in a lineup of sluggers, singled home the tie-breaking run in the ninth inning last night as the Oakland Athletics beat the Boston Red Sox 4-3 for a commanding 2-0 lead in the American League playoffs.

The Athletics headed home, where they swept all six games from Boston this season and have won 14 of the last 15. Game 3 is tomorrow night with Oakland's Bob Welch facing Mike Boddicker.

Jose Canseco, who led the majors with 42 home runs and 124 RBI, homered for the second straight game and Mark McGwire hit an RBI single in the seventh for a 3-2 lead before Rich Gedman's home run in the bottom half of the inning tied it.

But while Oakland's Bash Brothers brought the Athletics back against Roger Clemens, it was the bottom part of the order that won it. Ron Hassey singled with one out against Red Sox relief ace Lee Smith and took third on Tony Phillips' two out single. That brought up Weiss, a .389 hitter against Boston this year, and he escaped a 0-2 hole against the fast-balling Smith and lined a single just in front of diving center fielder Ellis Burks.

Dennis Eckersley, who led the majors with 45 saves, got his second save of the series. Gene Nelson went one inning for the victory while Smith, who got out of a first-and-third jam in the eighth by retiring Canseco and Dave Parker on fly balls, took the loss.

Minutemen down Stags

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team rolled over the Stags of Fairfield University 4-0, yesterday afternoon on Upper Boyden Field.

The Minutemen, 7-4, will now head into Sunday's all-important Atlantic 10 showdown at Rhode Island with a healthy squad, scorching offense, and a four-game winning streak.

UMass scored three times in the first 25 minutes of this contest, and controlled play throughout. Two minutes and 12 seconds ticked off the clock before sophomore Carl Hanks jump-started the Minutemen out to a 1-0 lead, scoring on the first shot of the game. Hanks, who has scored four times in the last three games since suffering through an early season drought, took a long feed from midfielder Mike Mugavero and chipped the ball over oncoming Fairfield goalkeeper James Kallio.

Steve Cesnek scored his first of two goals on the afternoon at the 7:09 mark. Cesnek, who ranks among the league (and New England) scoring leaders with nine goals in 11 games, squeezed off a shot amid three Fairfield defenders after receiving the ball from Thomas Skiba 20 feet in front of the right goal post.

With fellow forward Louis Hollmeyer sidelined do to tendonitis recently, Hanks and Cesnek have caught fire. "Together, they're playing real well as a team of two," praised Gettler. "That's what I really like."

Cesnek tallied his second goal of the afternoon and ninth of the season with 22:42 left to play in the half, breaking in all alone against Kallio to give the Minutemen a 3-0 lead. As the Fairfield goalkeeper attempted to break up Cesnek with a slide tackle, the speedy junior dribbled around him, then steered the ball into a vacant net.

Minutemen hit the Rhode

Looking for fourth victory

By MATT GERKE
Collegian Staff

There have been years in the past when a game against the University of Rhode Island might mean a breather for the University of Massachusetts football team.

Maybe not an automatic win, but a situation where less effort might produce a victory.

That certainly won't be the case when the Minutemen take the field against the Rhode Island tomorrow at 1:30 p.m in Kingston.

An improved Ram team, combined with the harsh lesson UMass learned last year about taking people lightly, has ruled that out.

"Last year after the Maine game [in which UMass was the favorite but lost 31-14], I read comments in the paper from our players saying they had taken Maine lightly and that bothered me a lot," UMass head coach Jim Reid said.

"But the leadership on this team is a real plus. People like Bill Buttler, Joe Cullen, and Garrick Amos are not going to let it happen again."

That attitude has helped the Minutemen jump out to a 3-1 record and a tie with Villanova for first place in the Yankee Conference.

""You're only as good as your last game," Reid said. "We're still not where we want to be as a team yet. But we're getting better."

Although the offense has been powerful in each win this season, the overall team looked its best recently, in the second half of Saturday's win over Boston University.

In that half, the offense scored 24 points, which was nothing new, considering it has scored 44 or more points three times.

But the defense, which had been porous in the first three games, shut the Terriers down in almost every phase of the game while holding them scoreless. According to Reid, the defense tipped 18 passes against B.U.

"I talk to the different units of the team every Thursday night," Reid said. "And last Thursday, some guys just seemed embarrassed. But I felt it was about to eclipse into something."

UMass' Jerome Bledsoe (22) is third in the nation in Division 1-AA in punt returning with a 23.0 average.

The defense looked on Saturday more like what people had expected since the beginning.

"The defense looked good and that changes every aspect of the game," Reid said. "When we were up by three and it was 4th-and-3 from the B.U. 19, I felt our defense could shut them down, so we went for it, and suddenly we're up by 10. I think that was the key series in the game and we couldn't have done it without the defense."

And the Minutemen wouldn't be 3-1 without the play

Volleyball set for Penn State, St. Bonaventure

By RONN GARRY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts volleyball team hasn't reached the plateau of its schedule, it's reached Mt. Olympus.

The Minutewomen will face an opponent that has never lost an Atlantic 10 match, Penn State University, which is 27-0 in conference play with five consecutive A-10 titles. And not making the task any easier, UMass must first travel to St. Bonaventure University tonight at 7 p.m.

The Penn State game is the one that is marked at the beginning of the year in big red ink — Biggest Game of the Year, although UMass coach Carol Ford said all the games left are big.

When UMass battles PSU, it will be facing the team that unceremoniously bounced them from last year's A-10 tourney in three games.

Ford, however, is concerned with not overlooking St. Bonaventure.

"We don't know what they have. I don't know how much stock we can put in this, but they are leading (the conference) in hitting efficiency, kills per game, and digs per game. I don't want (UMass) to look over them," she said.

The trip to Olean N.Y. to face the Bonnies will give UMass a chance to work on some problems it had last Friday with George Washington University.

"For us, we feel like we're starting over again. We are getting back to basics and passing on tough serves," Ford said.

After Olean, tomorrow the Minutewomen travel to the Lady Lions' den.

How many teams can lose last year's Atlantic 10 Player-of-the-Year and still not miss a beat?

PSU has maintained an all-star type squad that had been blitkrieging opponents this year. They are currently 13-1, including two conference victories.

"Penn State had a tournament in which they beat Temple, Rutgers (the two conference teams), and Northeastern in less than an hour," Ford said.

"(Penn State coach Russ Rose) said no one has been able to touch their outside hitters this year."

Can you say un-der-dog?

"It would be a big upset (if UMass won) right now. Penn State doesn't think they are going to lose to anyone," Ford said.

"I just want to go into this weekend starting where we left off two weeks ago. Like the Brown match, good intensity, no slow starts.

"The worst thing we could do against Penn State is not play 110 percent," she said.

Now PSU presents a special matchup for Ford.

In 1981, Ford used to be an assistant coach at Penn State

Women's teams look to stay near the top

● Soccer heads south to take on UConn

By JIM CLARK

As if the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team hasn't had a hard time of it already this season, the team faces its biggest challenge to date this weekend.

The Minutewomen will be traveling to Storrs, CT. to face the University of Connecticut tomorrow at 11 a.m. The Huskies, currently ranked eighth in the nation, should present the Minutewomen with their toughest opposition thus far.

"They (UConn) have more dangerous people than any team we've faced this season," said UMass coach Jim Rudy.

Then again, the Minutewomen have yet to meet a team ranked as high as coach Len Tsantiris' Huskies. It only seems right that that would be the case.

The Huskies have been reeling a bit of late. Last weekend, when the team was ranked fourth, UConn jaunted south to t???ames to Barry University and the University of Central Florida.

"They lost a pair to the Florida powerhouses," said Rudy with a bit of satisfaction. Rudy was the coach of Central Florida before coming here this summer.

Connecticut has bounced back, beating Brown Wednesday night. Rudy made the trek to Providence to scout this weekend's opponent, and came away impressed.

"Their front six, and one of their defenders, can all come forward and score," Rudy said. "They have a lot of speed up front, including two of the fastest forwards I've seen this year."

For the second time this season, the University of Massachusetts' field hockey team will tackle the unenviable task of playing two road games back to back as it travels to Temple tomorrow Saturday and West Chester University on Sunday. Both games will start at noon.

Last time they played two straight on the road (Sept. 24 and 25), the Minutewomen were equal to the task, pulling off a couple of 4-0 trouncings of Atlantic 10 Conference rivals, Rutgers University and the University of Rhode Island.

"I think we're fit enough to do it," UMass coach Pam Hixon said. "I hope to platoon again like we did. I think the people that feel it the most are the midfielders."

The two wins put UMass atop the A-10 East Division with a 2-0 conference record. First place could be clinched tomorrow against West Division Temple.

The Owls are 5-3-1 overall and 1-1 in the A-10. They are coming off a loss to A-10 West leading Penn State on Wednesday.

Right now, UMass is 9-1, ranked No. 1 in New England and No. 3 in the nation by the NCAA.

"I think against Temple, we should be able to play a little bit more of a ball control game, possession, which is a little less tiring then playing the big ball that we have been playing," Hixon said. "They have a very dangerous center forward in Jane Catanzaro. She's excellent. So hopefully we'll contain her a little bit and control the midfield."

Rape story disclosed by freshman victim

By JANINE WARNER
Collegian Staff

Susan, who asked that her real name not be used, had been on campus less than a month when she was raped by two men she describes as "really nice guys."

Susan, a University of Massachusetts freshman, said she met the two men at a dorm-room get-together one Friday night last month. She was invited by a friend she knew from her home town, she said, and thought it would be a good chance to see some old friends and meet some new people.

She said she asked her roommate and her roommate's boyfriend to walk her to the party, so she would not be out alone at night.

Everything seemed fine when they got to the residence hall, she said. Susan, her roommate, and her roommate's boyfriend were all invited up to the room.

"[The guys] signed all three of us in; it's not like they were hiding anything; I didn't think anything of it," Susan said.

The two men told Susan her friend from home would arrive later. But he never did, she said.

"We were all just sitting around listening to music, and drinking," Susan said. "They were the perfect hosts. It was like we were all just sitting around with any of our friends," she said.

"We just went along to walk her there," Susan's roommate said. "We told the guys she had to leave early and asked them if we should come back and get her."

The two men offered to walk Susan home if her friend didn't show up.

After her roommate and her roommate's boyfriend left, things started to change, she said. "Then everything fell apart," Susan said.

Susan says both men raped her that night.

"I think it's really disgusting that they could both do that together," she said "They both decided to take full advantage."

"When they were finished being huge pigs, they helped me get dressed. They buttoned up my shirt and put my coat on for me. I thought they'd just push me out the door, and I'd never see them again," Susan said.

But the two men did walk Susan back to her room, she said. "They were really nice, they walked real slow with me all the way back up, but they kept saying 'nothing happened, right?' And then they tried telling me they had different names," she said.

"All the way up the hill they kept going, 'yeah, we just sat there, played cards and listened to Pink Floyd all night, right?,'" she said.

Susan said she thinks the men thought she was too drunk to be aware of what was going on. "I was drunk, but I was not mentally out of it," Susan said.

"That's what pisses me off," she said. "They acted like nothing happened. I know they knew they had done something wrong, or they wouldn't have tried changing their names."

As soon as they reached Susan's door, the two men fled, she said. "They left before my roommate could see them again. I really think they have no idea that I know who they are."

Susan said she chose not to press charges because she doesn't think it will do any good. She did, however, seek advice from UMass police officer Joanne O'Connor, who is specially trained to handle sensitive crimes.

O'Connor said most of the rapes at UMass are date or acquantaince rapes. "The people you think you know or can trust are the ones who will take the most advantage of you," she said. [center] Getting help — Rape Crisis Hotline

Susan's roommate and another friend said they didn't know what to do to help Susan that night.

Officer O'Connor suggests women call the police rape crisis line at 545-2677 (K-COPS), even if they don't want to press

Red Sox season over after sweep by A's

● Pennant run thrills fans

By STEVE RICHARDS
Collegian Staff

The Sox suck.

That may be what you're thinking, but come on now; that's a little harsh.

After all, this is a team that set Boston, New England and the entire baseball world on its ear with one glorious burst of Morgan magic.

The Red Sox stumbled and grumbled their way through the first half of the season under Mr. Ennui, John McNamara. Enter Joe Morgan, the Wizard of Walpole, the hero of the hunch, no longer the other Joe Morgan.

COMMENTARY

The Wiz injected confidence and a winning attitude into the Sox and they responded with vengeance.

Sure, the A's swept us. But remember, there once were brooms in Fenway, too, when the Olde Towne Team swept an 11-game homestand to start the season's second half and the 19-1 surge that welcomed Hometown Joe to the helm. Instant pennant race, just add Morgan.

This sweep was the heart of the incredible 24-game home winning streak that made summer in New England meaningful again. And the Fenway Faithful lost it.

Fans running onto the field became commonplace and one fanatic went so far as to bare his derriere at second base. One nut did a victory jig on the screen behind home plate. Even the Back Bay rats ran on the field to join the excitement. Beach balls were everywhere, but never so prevalent as when a group of enterprising, young bleacher creatures smuggled in about 50 of the suckers and releas-

Many Boston Red Sox fans at the University of Massachusetts felt their hearts sink Sunday as they watched the Oakland Athletics eliminate their team from the American League Championship Series.

The A's won the American League pennant by defeating the Sox 4-1.

Some Sox fans grieved the loss of the possibility of taking on the New York Mets in the World Series, while others calmly accepted it.

"It was one of the worst things that has ever happened to me," said Greg Baker, a sophomore sports management major. "I cried all night."

Baker, who considers himself a hard-core Sox fan, said he was devastated by the fact that the A's took the pennant in four straight games.

Another Sox fan Jay Alland, said he had a feeling the team would not make it to another face-off with the Mets. "The A's are a great team, and the Sox have done pretty badly the last couple of weeks, so I didn't think they'd win," he said.

Dave Werpheim, an accounting major, said, "I wasn't wicked sad, I've dealt with the Red Sox losing for years."

"It's embarrassing," said Gary Pzegeo, a senior finance major. "They had a good year, but I hate to see them walked-all-over like that."

Jeff Arsenault, a senior accounting major, said, "They were simply outclassed by a solid, and potentially great, Oakland ball club."

Even some Mets fans were disappointed to see the Boston team lose. Said an accounting major who wanted to keep his name a secret, "I wish they won so the Mets could play them and beat them again."

FBI claims foreign agents study in Boston

BOSTON (AP) — The head of the regional FBI office says foreign intelligence is interested in Boston's colleges and universities, in part because of the political leaders who emerge from Harvard and other schools.

The primary focus of foreign agents in the greater Boston area is its 1,400 defense firms, but James F. Ahearn, agent-in-charge of the FBI in Boston, said the agents are also interested in future political leaders.

"There's no question that some foreign students who come here to study have intelligence training, just as many diplomats do," Ahearn said.

Ahearn said the FBI estimates that one-third of the foreign diplomats double as intelligence officers, adding, "The level among students may not be that high, but some do have intelligence training."

In the past two years, a handful of foreign nationals in the Boston area have been expelled through the persona non grata process, said Ahearn, who declined to discuss pending cases.

The majority of those expelled were from the Soviet Union or Soviet bloc nations, but none was a student or a professor.

"We live in an open society," said John Shattuck, Harvard vice president for governmental relations. "That doesn't mean that foreign students aren't picking up bits and pieces of information, but that the costs of policing the flow of information are much greater than the benefits because of the nature of our system."

Ahearn said the Soviet bloc countries and more recently the People's Republic of China are the principal focus of counterintelligence. He said the Boston office since 1983 has doubled its counterintelligence staff.

Five years ago, an East German scientist, Alfred Zehe, was arrested in Boston on a charge of trying to steal classifies US defense data. He had come to Boston for an academic conference.

Prof. Louis Menand at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology said that when he was MIT provost "some students came forward voluntarily but privately to report being approached by Iran, Malaysia, Taiwan and other countries" about obtaining information or about domestic political matters.

"I also became convinced that the education or science and technology officers at local consulates had approached MIT students," he told The Boston Globe in a story published yesterday.

Menand said a corollary problem is that while the United States cracks down on attempted spying by communist nations, "it tends to let so-called friendly powers wander about the country doing what they want."

Dr. Alan Kasoff, director of the International Research Exchange Committee in Princeton, N.J., which reviews applications by foreign scholars for US study, said it would be naive to say that none had spy training. But he said no cases of espionage have been brought to his attention.

"Certainly, you sometimes hear questions about why foreign scholars are xeroxing everything in the library," he said. "But what is to distinguish excessive collection of information from spying?"

'Younger comrades' to replace Czechs

PRAGUE, Czechoslovakia (AP) — Czechoslovak Premier Lubomir Strougal, who headed the federal government for more than 18 years, and Slovak Premier Peter Colotka resigned yesterday, the state news agency CTK reported.

The announcement was made by Communist Party chief Milos Jakes at a plenary session of the party's Central Committee.

He said the resignations were accepted.

Strougal, believed to be the longest-serving premier in Europe, replaced Oldrich Cernik in January, 1970.

Colotka has served as Slovak premier since May 1969 and as Czechoslovak deputy premier since September 1969.

In his speech to the session, Jakes also announced changes in the top-ruling Politburo, the party secretariat, the Central Committee itself and federal Czech and Slovak governments.

Jakes was quoted as saying the proposed changes, "proceed from the need for a new deployment of leading cadres in the interest of mastering the demanding tasks of economic and social restructuring."

There have long been changes in Czechoslovakia and James and other officials indicated for some time that younger people would be promoted to senior positions.

In remarks winding up a two-day session of the Central Committee on April 9, Jakes said the leadership wanted "to elevate younger comrades, and thus create conditions for further successful fulfillment of party tasks."

He then also said it was "an important requirement to ensure that qualified young people are more frequently proposed" for key economic and other jobs.

At today's meeting, opening a two-day plenary session on ideology, Jakes also proposed that the next party congress be moved forward by one year and take place in 1990.

Court action to be appealed

Trustee cites six reasons

By GEORGE FRANCY
Collegian Staff

A decision by the Student Judiciary disallowing the ratification of Shari Silkoff and Jason Rabinowitz as Student Government Association co-presidents is being appealed by Student Trustee Stephanie Orefice.

Clerk of Courts Paul Picirrillo has yet to grant Orefice's appeal because he said he is trying to get another hearing on whether Silkoff and Rabinowitz can hold office as co-presidents. There is a discrepancy between the Student Government Association Constitution and its bylaws as to whether two people can hold the office.

Picirrillo said he has not yet been able to get a room in which to hold the hearing, which would supposedly clear up the ambiguities in the the rules by either installing the co-presidents-elect or barring them from office. A decision on this question would apparently make Orefice's appeal unnecessary.

Orefice is advocate for the SGA Coordinating Committee, which ratified Silkoff and Rabinowitz as presidents in a partial capacity during the summer. The Coordinating Committee acts as the full senate during summer break.

Senator Mary Rita Kropp filed a request for judicial review of the Coordinating Committee's ratification. Judicial review is a process by which the actions of a governmental body are examined to see if they are allowed by the body's constitution.

Kropp called for the review because of a restraining order issued by the Student Supreme Court May 11 that barred the co-presidents from holding office until a decision can be made on whether two people can hold the office of SGA president.

A tribunal of justices ruled Sept. 27 that the six members of the Coordinating Committee who voted for ratification were in contempt of court. The five who abstained from voting were given a public censure.

Explaining the ruling, Picirrillo said, "This is a kind of public slap on the wrist. It says the justices don't think the members of the committee are upholding the constitution." He said the ruling consists of no other sanctions.

Orefice is using the contempt of court and censure ruling as one of the reasons for her appeal. She says this penalty is too harsh. "All those people that abstained from voting should not be punished," Orefice said.

Picirrillo said, "I can't see how [the contempt of court and the censure ruling] is too strong. She's used to seeing everyone just get away with whatever they're doing. I didn't write that decision but I stand by it."

Orefice pointed out that the hearing was held on a Sunday, which is against state and federal law, as a second reason for the appeal.

Picirrillo counters that the courts follow the SGA Constitution. "I don't see anywhere in the constitution where it says no trials on Sundays," Picirrilo said. He added that the SGA could not be expected to follow every state and federal law because this would create logjams in the system.

As a final reason for the appeal, Orefice said, "Judicial review does not allow for punitive damages." This refers again to the tribunal's ruling that members of the Coordinating Committee are in contempt of court or censured. Orefice said members of the committee should not be punished for abstaining from voting.

Picirrillo said he knew of no rule against punishment for judicial review.

Orefice has also filed for a mistrial for three reasons. One, Orefice said two of the justices were not appointed by their constituencies.

Piccirrillo maintains there are letters on file from the constituencies appointing the justices. "She never came by and looked at the letters," Picirrilo said. Orefice said Picirrillo has not been in his office to show her the letters.

Orefice is also calling for a mistrial because she says 25 signatures are required by the SGA Bylaws for a judicial review to take place.

Kropp's request did not have 25 signatures, but Picirrillo cites a case from several years ago that changed the bylaws to allow for a judicial review with less than 25 people signing the request.

Orefice claims she has asked for the documentation on the case, and Picirrillo has not produced it.

"The bylaws are outdated in a lot of ways," Picirrillo said. "I'd have a hard time looking for that individual case." Picirrillo said he could not get the paperwork on the case because the file is locked and the key is missing.

As a third reason for the mistrial, Orefice claims she was not given a copy of the US Bill of Rights. She said this is required by the US Constitution for all people standing trial.

Picirrillo said he did not know the facts about this charge and could not respond to it.

If Picirrillo grants the appeal or the mistrial, Orefice may try to prove again the Coordinating Committee was not violating the restraining order of the court by ratifying Silkoff and Rabinowitz.

School plans recycling project

Sorting of bottles and paper by students may cut disposal costs

By DEBORAH RITTER
Collegian Correspondent

Students at the University of Massachusetts next year may find themselves separating their trash before they throw it away as part of a comprehensive recycling plan scheduled to begin late in 1989.

The Amherst Recycling Committee is planning a program for UMASS that may be the prototype for large universities across the country, said Physical Plant senior architect and Recycling Committee member Marty Smith.

The program will stress education and voluntary participation, she said. Recyclable products will be newspaper, computer and other types of high-quality paper, and glass, she said.

An experimental program will begin in selected dorms sometime next month, said Assistant Director of Housing John Findley. The residence halls being considered are Butterfield, Knowlton, Brown, Washington, Mackimmie, Webster and Greenough, he said.

Students and staff will be asked to dispose of recyclables in at least one extra bin. The purpose of the program is to find different systems that will work in different types of residence halls, Findley said.

Smith said the University's transient population will present difficulties with education. "Recycling will take extra effort in our throw-away society. Glass must be cleaned and newspaper cannot be mixed with colored advertising inserts," she said.

The Recycling Committee will be hiring a consultant to analyze data now being compiled by the Physical Plant and to make policy recommendations, said Grounds and Custodial Division Chief Al Potter. In the last week of September sanitation workers began keeping records of how much solid waste UMass produces every day and where it comes from, he said.

On Thursday, Sept. 29, 33,580 pounds of trash were brought to the Amherst landfill at a cost of $56 per ton, Potter said. That is almost $1,000 per day. The figure does not include sewage or trash from the Campus Center, which is serviced by a private contractor.

At least 20 percent of the refuse that goes to the landfill annually comes from UMass, said Superintendent of Public Works Stanley Ziomek.

Department of Public Health professor Gary Moore said landfills across the country are filling up at a rapid rate, and they are subject to new federal regulations that drastically limit their capacity. Among the new requirements are liners that prevent leaking into groundwater supplies and locations that will not damage the surrounding environment, Moore said.

UMass had its own landfill until the late 1960's located on the northwest corner of campus, said Potter.

The committee will be looking for ways to reduce consumption of goods that produce trash.

Smith said she would like to see a campus-wide cutback in the use of styrofoam products.

Implementation of the recycling program is contingent upon the scheduled completion sometime next fall of the Material Recovery Facility in Springfield. The state-funded center will accept recyclables from UMass at no cost, Smith said.

That does not mean that recycling will not be inexpensive. "No matter what we do, it's going to cost," she said. "We need a staff to 'police' trash disposal, so it's properly sorted. We may be required to transport it to Springfield, she said."

Election today for student senate; sub-station question on ballot

By GEORGE FRANCY
Collegian Staff

Elections are being held today for seats on the Student Government Association Undergraduate Student Senate.

A total of 96 seats are electable from the five residential areas, the commuter area, and the Greek area. Not all of these seats have someone running for them, however, according to Karen Flanagan, co-chairman of the Governmental Affairs Committee of the SGA. The uncontested seats may be filled by write-in candidates, Flanagan said. The deadline for applications to have a name appear on the ballot was Thursday.

Flanagan said there had been some problems getting people to work the polls because of the long weekend. She said the weekend might also contribute to a low voter turnout.

Brendan Case, co-governmental affairs chairman, said turnout is generally higher in the spring elections than in the fall. "A lot of the new students don't know what the SGA does and who is running. Also, I think the presidential election contributes to a higher turnout in the spring.

There is a referendum question on tomorrow's ballot asking if the police sub-station in Washington Residence Hall should be removed.

One of the interesting sidelights to this year's election is Dean Chambers' decision to use the slogan "Together We Win"in his bid to capture the Hamlin House seat with John Caucis.

This slogan was used by Student Trustee Stephanie Orefice, Commuter Area Government President Jay Festa, SGA Co-Presidents-Elect Shari Silkoff and Jason Rabinowitz and other candidates last semester.

Chambers said he does not want to connect himself and Caucis with other candidates who have used the slogan. "Theirs was a platform more oriented toward serving certain sectors of the student body. Ours is the politics of serving all the students." Chambers said.

Silkoff was unfazed by Chambers' usage of the slogan. "He obviously wants to win, and he's trying to tap into something that's already won," she said.

Polling places for today's election are the Hatch, Worcester, Franklin, Berkshire and Hamphsire Dining Commons. Check these locations for times.

Candidates seek Italian support on holiday

WASHINGTON, D.C. (AP) — George Bush and Michael Dukakis courted the support of Italian-Americans in competing Columbus Day appearances yesterday that left plenty of time to polish their lines in private for this weeks; second and final presidential campaign debate.

Both camps said they expected the 90-minute debate to be held at 9 p.m. EDT Thursday night on the campus of UCLA, and the presidential rivals were flying to the West Coast today to prepare.

Dukakis spent his morning in New York with Gov. Mario Cuomo and John F. Kennedy Jr. The Democratic candidate marched in the annual Columbus Day parade in New York City after first proposing a program to ease the way into the housing market for first-time home buyers.

"George Bush has no housing program. He has no solutions," the Democrat said in a speech in Levittown, a Long Island community that was the embodiment of the post-World War II boom in affordable housing. "He has no new ideas."

But Bush does have a lead in the nationwide public opinion polls, and the vice president pointed with satisfaction to weekend surveys rating him the leader across the South and in scattered other states.

The Republican candidate street-campaigned in New Jersey, walking through an Italian neighborhood in south Trenton before delivering a speech on crime.

"Frankly, law abiding Americans are fed up with the cruel and unusual punishment inflicted on them by those who are soft on crime," the vice president said.

While refraining from the type of harsh attack on Dukakis' crime record that has become a regular part of his campaigning, Bush criticized "liberal thinkers" who he said "thought it was compassionate to lighten up on sentencing to allow early releases and furloughs".

That was a muted remark directed at the Masasachusetts prison furlough program that Bush has repeatedly criticized during the campaign. In one infamous incident, a murderer out of jail on a furlough escaped and brutally attacked a Maryland couple.

Bush told reporters aboard Air Force Two en route to New Jersey that he favors a review of the federal furlough program but said he doesn't have any "specific feelings" in mind. In a jab at Dukakis, he added he wants to make sure the federal program doesn't "slip into the Massachusetts model."

There was nothing muted about Dukakis' attack on Bush in his speech on housing.

The Democratic presidential candidate outlined a plan that he dubbed "Home Start" that would allow first-time home buyers to use their Individual Retirement Account or tax-deferred pension savings for a down-payment on a home. Current law prohibits the use of those funds without payment of deferred taxes and in some cases, a penalty for withdrawal.

Dukakis said his program would also include provisions to lower down payments and closing costs and to raise borrowing limits on federally guaranteed mortgages. He cited no cost aides were not immediately available to provide details.

Candidates work hard touring the country as they gear up for the upcoming second presidential debate.

Campaigns continue in NY

LEVITTOWN, NY (AP) — Democrat Michael Dukakis yesterday blamed the Reagan-Bush administration for economic conditions that put affordable housing out of reach for many Americans while Republican George Bush continued to depict his rival as soft on crime.

Both candidates kept their schedules light in advance of a second presidential debate, which campaign staffers now say will be held Thursday night, barring a rain-out in the baseball playoffs.

Dukakis and Bush campaigned this morning but planned to spend the afternoon in preparation for their Los Angeles encounter.

In Levittown, N.Y., Dukakis used the backdrop of a post-World War II community to charge the administration with breaking the federal government's post-war promise to help families buy their first home.

"Since this administration took office, the price of houses has raced ahead of people's wages and has made it impossible for many people to buy the homes they grew up in," Dukakis said, unveiling a program that would allow first-time home-buyers to use their Individual Retirement Account of tax deferred pension savings for a down-payment on a home.

Bush continued to rail against liberals on the crime issue, saying "Frankly, law-abiding Americans are fed up with the cruel and unusual punishment inflicted on them by those who are soft on crime."

Though he did not mention Dukakis by name yesterday, Bush has relentlessly criticized the former Massachusetts furlough program under Dukakis' governorship.

Smith lecture series to explore the role race plays in politics

Collegian Staff reports:

The Smith College council of SOAR, the Society Organized Against Racism, will present a lecture series this fall on "Politics and Race: Election-year Reflections on Life in the United States." The five speakers will explore ways in which race and the politics of race continue to play a significant role in our lives. All lectures are open to the public and free of charge.

Gloria Anzaldua, a Chicana poet, editor and writing teacher, gave the first lecture Sunday night. The title was: "En el Espacio de Mi Silencio"("In the Space of My Silence"): Notes on Race, Class, and Women of Color." Anzaldua, of Santa Cruz, California, is co-editor of This Bridge Called My Back: Writings by Radical Women of Color and author of a new book, Borderlands-La Frontera; The New Mesiza.

Randy Kennedy, a faculty member at Harvard Law School, spoke last night in Wright Hall Auditorium. His recent Articles include "Race Relations Law and the Tradition of Celebration The Case of Professor Schmidt"("IColumbia Law Review 1986) and "McClesky v. Kemp: Race, Capital Punishment, and the Supreme Court"(Harvard Law Review, 1986).

The other speakers will be Anne Braden, jounalist and organizer of the Southern Social Justice Movements (Oct. 24, 7:30 p.m., Seelye 10), Warren Furutani, a member of the Los Angeles Board of Education (Oct. 25, 4:30 p.m.), and Bernice Johnson Reagon, civil rights activist, cultural historian, and longtime member of Sweet Honey in the Rock (Nov. 1, 4:30 p.m., Sage Hall).

SOAR Council is represented on many college and university campuses in the Northeast. It is committed to both exposing and combatting the many forms of racism and to supporting the expression and understanding of cultural diversity.

Last winter, Smith President Mary Maples Dunn announced the creation of a $10,000 fund for community education programs organized by SOAR Council; this lecture series is being financed through that fund.

Author Gloria Anzaldua gave a lecture Sunday night entitled "En el Espacio de mi Silencio,": Notes on Race, Class, and Women of Color.

Opportunities available for low-income students at Amherst chapter of 'A Better Chance' program

By EDWARD SMITH
Collegian Correspondent

A Better Chance (ABC) offers academically talented youths from low income and disadvantaged areas an opportunity to attend some of the nations best public and private high schools.

The Amherst ABC house, which has become a home away from home for 10 students, has for 20 years been a bridge between high school and college for its students.

The students reside in the ABC house during the academic school year under the supervision of Mitch and Liz Smith. Also residing at the house are four tutors who help the students maintain the program's academic standards.

"You build relations with the people you live with, and you have the experience of independence to become yourself," said former ABC tutor Ellen Olmstead. "It is the independence gained from being away from home that helps prepare students for the transition from high school to college," she said.

The students share equally in maintaining the house and are assisted in the preparation of a time management schedule. According to former ABC student Brett Andrews, "Your average sophomore will never have a chance to experience the organizational skills bestowed by the program upon the individuals in it."

Students may apply for the ABC program at the end of the ninth grade. The Amherst ABC committee then selects students from a pool of candidates created by the national office. The students have a chance to visit Amherst and attend classes at Amherst High School, before deciding if this particular program is to their liking. Upon selecting the Amherst program they are matched with host families that provide support and counseling for the students, as they adjust to their new environment.

The program "addresses the issue of equality in education," according to Director Mitch Smith. The ABC program holds an annual walk-a-thon to raise awareness and support for the program. The funds raised from the walk are used for improvements in residential accommodations. The walk will be held Friday. All persons or organizations interested in participating should contact Liz Smith.

Mt. Washington hikers safe after frigid night

MOUNT WASHINGTON, N.H. (AP) — Three poorly equipped hikers were safe yesterday after 24 hours in snow, fog and wind on Mount Washington, where the wind-chill at the summit was 17 below zero yesterday morning.

"It's a miracle," said Maj. Henry Mock of the state Fish and Game Department, which handles searches. "If we find them alive, we're going to need lots of help carrying them out," he had said earlier.

In fact, the three — fraternity brothers at Northeastern University — were in good condition when they reached Crawford Notch, a pass on the western side of the mountain, about 2 p.m. yesterday, Mock said. He identified them as Steve Sardella, 20, of Marlboro, Matt Dube, 21, of Bethany, Conn.; and Andy Stewart, 23, of Syosset, New York. A companion who turned back part way up the mountain was identified by Mock as Noel Bouvier of Boston.

Stewart, a senior, said a storm struck the three suddenly.

"It was fine, then, two minutes later, there were 60 mph winds and heavy snow," he said yesterday afternoon. "The snow was up to my chin all the way down.

"It was really, really cold. We're very lucky."

Stewart said the trio stayed warm by building a fire — even burning dollar bills to keep it going. They resumed their hike down the mountain about 8 a.m.

"There was a point where we really didn't think we were going to make it," said Stewart.

"We all thought [we might not make it], but never said it," agreed Dube.

Lt. David Hewitt of fish and game said 40 people participated in the rescue effort. He said many don't recognize how bad weather on the mountain can be.

"Just because they had the day off doesn't mean it's going to be warm and sunny up there," he said.

Peter Crane, a member of the staff of a mountain-top weather observatory, said the three ignored advice from a shelter caretaker on the 6,288-foot mountain Sunday evening and continued toward the summit. But the hikers said yesterday afternoon they received no warnings, and the caretaker could not be reached.

A search official, Michael Torrey of the Appalachian Mountain Club, said the three had no rain gear or warm clothes and were wearing blue jeans and poor boots. One had a sweatshirt, another a sweater and the third a parka. He said their provisions consisted of two apples and a Coca-Cola bottle full of water.

Washington is notorious for severe and quickly changing weather. Snow has fallen on the summit in every month, and the highest surface wind speed ever recorded — 231 mph — was registered at the observatory in 1934.

Inexperienced hikers frequently get into trouble in the White Mountains because conditions are far worse at and near summits than at trailheads in valleys below.

Another weather observer, John Howe, said the summit had a low Sunday of 14 degrees about mid-morning. Torrey said winds gusted on Sunday to 70 mph.

Torrey, manager of AMC facilities in New Hampshire's North Country, said searchers yesterday reported snow drifts up to four feet deep. A road to the summit had been closed for three days because of the drifts.

Crane said the four hikers were advised about 4 p.m. Sunday by the caretaker of a shelter at about 3,900 feet not to continue up. Three went on, and were last seen by the caretaker through binoculars at about 4,800 feet with darkness falling, Crane said.

Some facts and myths about homosexuality

Today, if you hadn't heard, is "National Coming-Out Day." Today gay men and lesbians gather in population centers where no one knows or cares who they are, and they fling aside their encumbering inhibitions to let the public see their true unchaste selves. In an awesome display of strength, homosexuals and sympathizers boldly wear blue jeans today to impress us with their numbers. Some are even so daring (horrors!) as to wear pink triangles or carry purple balloons.

I find it difficult to take gay awareness events seriously. Maybe it's the chaotic circus atmosphere. Maybe it's the cowardice masquerading as courage — really, showing solidarity by wearing blue jeans? Or maybe it's because the propaganda is doled out by the barnyard shovelful. But I take their rhetoric seriously. Consider three claims.

10 percent of the world is gay. Maybe. . . and maybe not. There isn't a valid way to test this claim historically; "10 percent" is based on the Kinsey reports of the 1940s. The reports had reams of statistics but were based on unorthodox interviewing techniques, and by his own admission Alfred Kinsey couldn't interview most people because his work was considered indecent. Also, he classified subjects as homosexual if they'd had one same-sex encounter as an adult.

Homosexuality is genetically determined. Gays and lesbians keep saying this, but nobody ever backs it up with scientific journal citations. Where are they, folks? I'm science-literate; I'll read them (if they exist).

Rusty Denton

Homosexuality is not a mental disease. No disagreement here. Diseased people have no choice; those who enthusiastically hop into bed together do. The psychiatric misconception is of their own making; we're supposed to believe that gays have a different sexual orientation than the rest of the population, but we're never given a good reason. Heterosexuals have drawn their own conclusions.

Now these are three sober issues, but you have to take the pertinent gay positions with a grain of salt. As it turns out, there is a driving force behind homosexuality, but it doesn't have much to do with the propaganda.

Exodus International is a Christian organization run by people who have left the gay lifestyle; it is devoted to aiding others who want to do the same. They've helped thousands "go straight," and they find that 90 percent of the gay or bisexual men they counsel come from broken homes or from a home where the father was absent or emotionally unavailable. Women are often chosen as role models by boys in such homes because women are seen as objects of men's love. Gay men are trying to fill the need for masculine love that should have been met by their own fathers.

Exodus has also found that 75 percent of the lesbians they see have suffered physical abuse or incest at the hands of a male family member. The other 25 percent have been emotionally abused by such a man — for instance, seeing their mothers beaten. Their lesbianism often starts with an unhealthy emotional dependence on other women, and gradually develops into sex.

I think this is the kind of "awareness" we need to have on Coming-Out Day, and I think it demands a response. One response is to love gay men and lesbians; they've had enough fear of society and pain from families. The usual harassment gays see in America doesn't help the situation, and won't make them "un-gay." We also need to evaluate what kind of fathers we want our own children to have: true fatherliness doesn't make girls distrustful of men and doesn't make boys crave male acceptance.

Eastside should help SW

Wake up Eastside! Isn't it evident what is happening on this campus? And if you are one of the few who have discovered a continuing series of infringements on student's rights and freedoms, why haven't you spoken up?

Over the past few weeks, it has been well publicized that a police sub-station is (not proposed, but is) going to be located in Washington Tower in Southwest. The administration has ignored student concern, opposition, and most recently, a petition begun in the tower.

While students in Southwest have been vehemently protesting the issue, the attitude of the Eastside is indifference. Doesn't the Eastside realize that similar sub-stations are proposed for every residential area on campus? And who do you think will determine the success of failure of such a sub-station, students or administration?

Students in Southwest are fighting to protect their rights of privacy, but they need our help! The time to react to this situation is now, not after the administration has determined that Southwest was a huge success. The residents of Northeast, Sylvan, Central and Orchard Hill must unite in opposition to ensure that another of our personal freedoms is not violated.

If the administration and the Department of Public Safety want to "establish a personal tie with the students," why don't they hold an Open House down at the police station?

Don't blame the liberals

Peace between Republicans and Democrats — I though it might actually happen. I was reading W. Greg Rothman's column ("Snorting away America's future," Oct. 3) and agreeing with it! I was! "The (drug) issue transcends political parties." Conservatives and . . . oh no. I knew it was too good to be true. It's only Rothman's usual blather about liberals being at fault for all our problems. This time, liberals were to blame for drugs.

I could easily argue that Republicans are to blame for this nation's drug problems: The Reagan administration cuddling up to a certain drug-trafficking Panamanian leader, a certain former Republican Club President who once spit his chewing tobacco in my face. I could go on, but that's not my point.

Scapegoating does not make drug problems go away. Isn't it time that issues really start to "transcend political parties?" Regardless of who is at fault, we all need to work together to stop mindless drug abuse.

Rights and wrongs

There are students in Washington Tower who hope to prevent the police sub-station, planned for their dormitory. They claim its inclusion in their 'home' is the first step toward a 'police state.'

There is a larger point to consider, however, than whether students should approve the latest Public Safety innovation.

The sub-station is just one of many recently-created facets of life at the University of Massachusetts in which the students' protesting voice went unheard.

When students began to win too many court cases, the administration pulled the plug on the Legal Services Office. Last semester, students were basically told they couldn't smoke anymore in their dormitory rooms.

This year, alcohol was banned from from outdoor events, effectively ending tailgaiting at UMass. Combine the above with the no-kegs-in-the-dorms rule, and an equally stringent guest policy, and it becomes clear who's running the show at UMass.

It's not the students.

What's so disheartening is the apparent lack of consideration to students in making all of the above decisions.

LSO was taken away during the summer and the alcohol ban was imposed without the input of any student committee. The idea of the sub-station was arrived at without student-input; it was enacted despite student out-cry. Students have been told that future stations, part of Executive Director of Public Safety Arthur Hilson's PEACE program, are on the way.

It would seem reasonable that student opinion would matter in making decisions regarding students. After all, the reason we have a university is so students will learn. What students have learned from the administration is that students haven't been, aren't, and won't be a part of the decision-making process at UMass.

The more important questions remain:

- What student rights are sacred?
- What role do students play in preserving those rights?
- Are student-administration committees useless to the decision-making process, as when Chancellor Joseph Duffey sidestepped a committee to impose the alcohol ban?

Students have the opportunity to vote today on a referendum question regarding the sub-station. We aren't advocating for or against the sub-station. We are advocating for the administration to give serious consideration to how students vote, and to include student opinion in future decisions. The right to be included in the decision-making process is what students must demand.

Affordable Housing Act a solution for homelessness

You don't have to be on the street to understand homelessness; you just have to be willing to remember a little longer than the average television viewer.

Since 1949, federal housing policy has called for the provision of a decent home and suitable living enviornment for every American family in the United States.

Daria Casinelli

Until 1979, the federal government spent approximately $30 billion each year to create affordable housing. However, during the Reagan administration, federal support for affordable housing has been slashed from $30 billion to approximately $7.5 billion. In light of this massive cut, the existence of three to four million homeless people in the United States today is easy to understand.

What doesn't make sense is why the federal government should subsidize housing at all. Given the good ole American free market, shouldn't housing just be there for any good ole American to buy? Hard as it may be, when it comes to understanding homelessness as a long-term social problem, it takes more than a long memory. It takes the willingness to question the free market, and more.

Fifty-four percent of US citizens received income from property in 1983; they're called landlords. Forty-four percent received no income from property; we're called tenants. Anybody can see that half the population is renting to the other half of the population. The budget cuts simply removed the federal government as a competitor, they didn't create the problem.

If this completely legal arrangement comes as no surprise to you, you might ask yourself, "What made some people so special that they can own several homes, while others can't own any?" Some say it's hard work and the American way. Others say Fate pointed its fickle finger and said, "You, you there, you mostly white, mostly male people, you're landlords, the rest of you. . . tenants!"

The statistics say that most wealth in the United States is inherited and that has very little to do with fate or hard work. The question is not whether it is legal, but whether it is moral. Isn't every human being deserving of a place to live?

If we take it as truth that every human being deserves a home, what can be done about the present state of affairs? Surprising as it may seem, I'm not about to suggest class warfare, nor am I about to suggest some horribly ponderous state socialism scheme.

The Affordable Housing Act, HR 4990, will allocate $75 billion over the next five years for the construction of new housing, the upgrade of existing public low-cost housing, and the acquisition of additional new units. The bulk of this money will be distributed not by private enterprises or by the federal colossus, but by non-profit, community-based organizations that will keep the land permanently affordable for low-income people.

It's true that most of the funds for the Affordable Housing Act will come from more taxes for the rich. On the other hand, it represents a significant and and long overdue redistribution of property in the United States, without class warfare. What a deal.

Unfortunately, the homeless can't count on the prosperous seeing what a great opportunity they're being offered. Winter is coming and the homeless message is being lost behind campaign slogans. Last year approximately 90 homeless people died in Massachusetts; this year the number is expected to be higher.

Legal and civil disobedience is scheduled to occur in different communities around the country every week until election day.

You really don't have to be on the street to understand homelessness, but when you know what's going on, the street is the only place to be.

Daria Casinelli is a UMass student

Wear jeans and be an ally

Today, the nation's gay, lesbian, and bisexual community will celebrate National Coming Out Day. "Coming out" refers to the popular expression "to come out of the closet," metaphorically used to express a homosexual or bisexual person's realization of his or her sexuality and the subsequent adaptation to a new life style. Although this may seem an easy process, it actually takes many people years to accomplish. Few are fortunate and courageous enough to "come out" during their adolescence, while despairing numbers are inflicted with an inappropriate lifestyle for many of their adult years. Some live a lie indefinitely, denying their true feelings as they raise a family, celebrate wedding anniversaries, and whimper in the silence of their closet. What makes homosexual and bisexual people deny themselves by leading a heterosexual life style that, for them, is unsuitable? Perhaps a hostile world that fears non-conformity.

Our society is heterosexually oriented. Since birth people are assumed to be heterosexual and are treated as such long before they become sexually active. Any deviance is violently shunned. Everyone learns from an early age that "queers," "fags," "dykes," "lezzies," and "fence sitters" are to be hated even before he or she knows what homosexuality is. In fact, people are so busy hating homosexuals that they cannot imagine a brother or sister, a friend, a police officer, a high school teacher, a college professor, or anyone else's being gay or lesbian. As a result, homosexuals and bisexuals are often afriad to tell anyone of their feelings for they fear rejection from family and friends.

Although many homosexuals and bisexuals remain in the closet, some have "come out" and live on-campus here at UMass. In fact, it is estimated that 10 percent of the student body is gay, lesbian or bisexual. Unfortunately, the on-campus environment is also heterosexually oriented and pays little heed to homosexual or bisexual people's plight. Albeit that every student is not expected to be aware of homosexuality, but Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs certainly is. During his speech at the New Student's Convocation he conciously perpetuated heterosexism by assuming that all new students would get married and have families. Considering that his speech was devoted to diversity, a group so diverse as the homosexual and bisexual community is difficult to overlook.

It's time to start accepting homosexual and bisexual people and help make their coming out process easier. We can start by making UMass a non-threating environment today. One way to do this is to wear blue jeans today and you shall be considered a hetersexual ally. For those who are afraid to come out of the closet, start today and wear a pair of blue jeans; this will be your day.

Mayor upset at state bill hedging

NORTH ADAMS (AP) — Mayor John Barrett III said yesterday he expects the state to cover at least part of the medical bills of cadets who fell ill at a state-run police academy, and is angry at suggestions help won't be forthcoming.

"The state has messed this whole thing up," the mayor said. "We're self-insured, but we're looking for somebody to pick up the tab for these guys if it doesn't cover 100 percent."

Barrett said the biggest bill in his community will be the week-long hospital stay of North Adams Cadet William Baker. He was among 16 cadets from the class of 50 who were hospitalized last month in their first week at the Agawam academy, which trains police officers for western Massachusetts towns and cities.

One cadet remained hospitalized Monday, three weeks after he collapsed from heat stroke on the first day of class. Cadet Timothy Shepard, 25, of Pittsfield was still in critical condition at a Pittsburgh hospital where he underwent a liver transplant two weeks ago.

Barrett estimated Shepard's medical bills will reach $500,000 and state Attorney General James Shannon, whose office is investigating the illnesses, said the payment will be worked out between the city and state.

Michael Lelyveld, press secretary for Administration and Finance Secretary Frank Keefe, said other cadets were covered by municipal insurance and he warned there wouldn't be state funds to offset those bills.

"The state is not there to come in and pick up the bills," he said.

James Dorsey, press secretary to Gov. Michael S. Dukakis, said Monday that cadets would not be liable for their medical bills, but he left unclear who would pay them.

"We will work that out with the municipalities," he said.

Cadets, police chiefs and doctors have alleged that a third of the class fell ill from too much exercise and too little water. In the wake of the allegations, the state's chief medical examiner has reopened an investigation into a cadet at an eastern Massachusetts academy.

A lawyer for the family of Cadet James Whitehouse of Braintree, who died in 1985, said yesterday he would call for an inquest if he was unsatisfied with probes by the medical examiner's office, the attorney general's office and the Criminal Justice Training Council, which runs the state's six police academies.

Attorney John Marani said he will meet with state officials today on the scope of their investigations.

He said the Whitehouse family was "in a significant, highly charged state right now" because of the allegations of tough academy training that have recently surfaced with the hospitalizations.

Whitehouse was 22 when he died on the second day of training at the state police academy in Framingham. A medical examiner ruled at the time that he died from a genetic disorder known as malignant hyperthermia, but the doctor has since been granted his request to reopen the case, saying he made his diagnosis on the basis of faulty information, including police claims that Whitehouse had been exercising only moderately.

The Union-News of Springfield reported yesterday that a cadet who asked not to be identified said she went on as crash diet and took diuretics to lose weight in the last few days before her training, a practice that a doctor said could cause severe dehydration.

Judge applications flow heavily

BOSTON (AP) — The Legislature's decision to create 26 judgeships to help relieve an overburdened court system is now burdening the Judicial Nominating Council with applications for the bench.

Council executive director Eleanor Mazzone declined to say how many applications have come in, but said as many as 39 arrived in a single day and that the total has been more that the last time a group of judgeships came open.

At stake are seven new Superior Court judgeships, eight in the district courts, six in the probate and family court system, four in the Massachusetts Appeals Court and one in the Land Court.

The council is responsible for screening the applicants and recommending candidates to the governor.

Reason for the high degree of interest in the posts may vary, but Mazzone credits the continuing esteem of the jobs.

"Becoming a judge is still prestigious and valuable and people will forego some of the advantages of private practice to be the zenith, the epitome of the legal profession," she said.

Other possible reasons include:

- Approval last summer of a bill allowing the state to take over ownership of some courthouses and to spend up to $320 million to repair or replace them.
- Enactment last January of a bill giving judges a 6 percent pay raise retroactive to July 1987 and another 6 percent raise in July 1988.
- Interest by trial lawyers who have spent two or three decades trying cases and are now ready for a career change.
- Interest by attorneys who believe there may be chances and opportunities because of the presidential candidacy of Gov. Michael Dukakis.
- Efforts by leaders of the Massachusetts Bar Association to interest highly qualified colleagues in sitting on the bench.

The pay raise and courthouse improvement bills sent the right message, said state bar president Thomas Maffei. "We still need more judges and secretarial and technical support for the judges," he said. "But anyone going on the bench now will have a responsible expectation of a secretary."

Maffei said most lawyers don't earn the high salaries that some people believe. He said the last survey five years ago indicated the average pay of Massachusetts attorneys is $40,000-to $50,000 yearly.

At that time, the associate justices of trial courts were being paid $60,000 yearly and the justices of the appeals court were getting $62,000.

Under the new pay scale, associate justices of the trial courts began receiving $83,060 yearly in July. The justices of the appeals court are being paid $83,708.

Dukakis support hurts doctor?

BOSTON (AP) — A Massachusetts doctor who endorsed Gov. Michael S. Dukakis for president says he's lost favor with some of his colleagues who blame Dukakis for problems with billing practices and malpractice insurance.

"It's considered in poor taste to be pro-Dukakis if you're a Massachusetts doctor," said Dr. James J. Siragusa, president of the Massachusetts Medical Society in 1987-88.

Siragusa, 62, an obstetrician who has retired to Maine, was removed from the society's councils after he endorsed the governor last summer. He said, the Judicial Committee contended it was because he had moved out of state.

"Massachusetts medicine is made up mostly of physicians who are against Dukakis and a small percentage who aren't, but won't admit it," he said.

Meanwhile, the campaign of Dukakis' opponent, Republican Vice President George Bush, is getting help from a newly formed Physicians for Bush organization this week.

The organization plans to begin mailing broadsides to the 500,000 doctors in the United States, giving its views of the presidential race.

Some Massachusetts physicians in mailings and speeches have already taken Dukakis to task.

They blame him for the 1985 law passed by the Legislature barring doctors from balance-billing Medicare recipients for fees beyond what the federal program pays.

They also don't like a similar Massachusetts Blue Shield rule which prevents doctors from balance-billing subscribers, about half the state's population.

In addition to the soaring malpractice insurance premiums, the doctors also claim the governor is behind a crackdown by the Massachusetts Board of Registration in Medicine against errant physicians.

"A lot of doctors in this state are very angry with Mr. Dukakis and a lot of it is visceral," said Dr. Gerald B. Healy, an ear-nose-throat specialist at Children's Hospital in Boston.

"They feel they're penalized every time they turn around. That's not all the governor's fault, I realize," he told The Boston Globe in a story published yesterday.

Healy said he does not know whether Bush will do anything better for doctors, but prefers him because "his views on health care have more reality".

charges.

"We can give them the best protection possible if they report it," O'Connor said. "We can advise them better than any friend can. We can let them know what their options are — and they do have options," she said.

The rape hotline is staffed by both male and female officers and a victim need not disclose her name to get help.

Susan's friends said they tried to advise her. "We thought she should get a physical done but she didn't want to go," her friend said.

O'Connor said it is important victims get a physical immediately but also pointed out they should not be pushed to do anything they don't want to do. It's important victims feel they are in control of what happens to them, she said.

"She is coming out of a situation where she didn't have any choices," O'Connor said of rape victims.

According to one of Susan's friends, she obtained a physical in her home town the day after the incident, and her doctor found evidence of semen from two different men.

Legal options

If a victim chooses to press charges, she can remain completely anonymous, said O'Connor. "The victim's name is never released."

"You testify strictly to the judge, the jury and the attorneys, and whatever you say is kept in that room," she said.

O'Connor said although rape is a felony, punishable by up to 20 years in prison, a student would most likely receive probation.

However, O'Connor pointed out that probation, and the record of a felony conviction for rape or sexual assault, can lead to problems throughout a student's life.

Prevention and Precaution

In an acquaintance rape, you have to rely on yourself to decide if something is wrong, O'Connor said. "If you feel uncomfortable, then get out of the situation."

"It's your body — you can say no," she said.

Be cautious of anything out of the ordinary, O'Connor said, such as "Unusual holding or touching or something that you just wouldn't expect from someone."

If you are in a residence hall and need to leave a particular party or a room, go downstairs and get security, she said.

You can also call the police or the escort service.

But, she said, "If the threat is there, and you really think someone is going to do bodily harm to you, sometimes the best thing is just to let it happen so that at least you get away with your life."

O'Connor said she thinks if more people understood what constitutes rape they might step forward.

The legal definition of rape is: penetration of any orifice by any object against one's will.

"It's all encompassing," O'Connor said. "It's not just intercourse; this involves oral sex, a candle, a bottle, a broomstick."

"Sometimes you get yourself into a situation that's not your fault," O'Connor said. "If you've been assaulted, don't be afraid to ask for help.

Many people are afraid to call the police, O'Connor said. They need to realize that "we're not going to look at them as if they did something wrong. They are the victim. We will do whatever we can to nurture them. We're not going to draw conclusions."

Alcohol is often a factor in acquaintance rape, O'Connor said. "A suspect may say, 'well, she was drinking and I had too much to drink and I got carried away.'"

But, O'Connor said, alcohol is never an excuse for not taking responsibility for your actions.

ed them en masse. The game, a Saturday come-from-behind thrashing of the Chicago White Sox, had to be held up for 10 minutes. It was all beautiful.

Still, it was very disappointing to see the Sox get brushed out of the playoffs so unceremoniously. There wasn't even time for the gut-wrenching agony us Sox fans seem to love. It made it appear that the team didn't even belong in the playoffs. Maybe it didn't.

The Sox simply peaked too early. It was Sunday, September 25 when the team capped back-to-back weekend series against the hated Yankees, in which the Sox won five of seven, with a 6-0 win at the Bronx. Remember that one? Greenwell with a first-inning three-run blast, Dewey later hit a two-run insurance shot and Clemens was Clemens.

The magic number was three . . . three . . . three. Pennant delirium had gripped the Hub. Who would've thought then that the Sox would win only one game of the last 11 they would play in 1988? Certainly not Joe Morgan.

All that's left now is to root against the dirty, nasty, slimy Mets. If the Sox can't do it, those stinking New Yorkers certainly can't. Even the pompous Steroids Kid would be better.

And we did dispose of the Yanks.

Besides, the Red Sox in the Series would have just been another distraction from school, work and the "important" things.

Oh, to be distracted like that again.

Uncle blues R&B to go

By COSMO MACERO JR.
Collegian Staff

Well, the semester is about a month old, and the local scene is in full swing. New bands seem to be popping up everywhere, just what we like to see. Keep the letters and information coming in about any bands you know of that deserve some ink.

Local Vocal

The Southwest Battle of the Bands is Sunday, Oct. 23. The creme of the local band crop will be there, and it's certain to be a terrific show. Don't miss it.

Fans of classic style rhythm and blues will be pleased to hear about the area's promising new r&b quartet (no pun intended), Uncle Martha.

A local product if there ever was one, Uncle Martha was formed this Summer at the Tuesday night open blues jams at L'Oasis in Northampton. Working through meaty r&b standards like "Caledonia" and "Shake Shake Mama", Uncle Martha's rootsy sound is down-home beer hall and tobacco juice blues, and danceable rhythmic fun.

Guitarist Dave Murphy, drummer Laura Faye, and harmonica/trombone player Robert Harp are all members of the University community, while bass guitarist "Slap" Happy is a graduate of Rensellair Polytechnic Institute.

Harp, a veteran of Free Press and Goodspeed Rhythm Review, doubles as band manager. Look for good things from these folks in the near future.

Remember the Movers? They won last Spring's Eastside Battle of the Bands, and opened both the Eastside and Southwest concerts last May. Original members Brian Harrington(drums) and Joe Crashlead guitar, vocals) have reformed with a new lineup into Joe Crash and the Wiplash. Rockabilly, blues, tex-mex,

Steeple Jacks: a good food value

By STEVE PENHOLLOW
Collegian Correspondent

When Patrick and Kim McCarthy, co-owners of Jake's in Northampton, bought Sunderland's Steeplejacks, their devoted Northampton customers sat up and took notice.

Anyone who has eaten either breakfast or lunch at Jake's knows its operating philosophy: lots of amazing food at surprisingly inexpensive prices. The question that those who frequented Jake's asked themselves was, "Will Steeplejacks measure up to this?" Happily, the answer is yes.

Steeplejacks was already a thriving establishment when the McCarthy's took over. "What we wanted to bring to it was our own sense of proportion," Kim MacCarthy explained. "Lord Jeffrey Inn style excellence at half the price."

In addition to the breakfast and lunch menus so familiar to Jake's regulars, Steeplejacks has an impressive lineup of dinner items. "We offer a good variety of items-some traditional, others a bit more unusual," Kim said. "We want our customers to feel free to try dishes they may not be familiar with, without having to worry about the cost of them." Indeed, the most expensive entree on the menu is only $10.95.

The McCarthy's are most proud of their Wild Mushroom Streudel, which Patrick developed while running the Lord Jeffrey Inn several years back. As a feature on the Lord Jeff menu, it was praised and written about in statewide publications.

"We want people to think of Steeplejacks as an interactive restaurant," Kim said. "We are always open to suggestions and comments."

The McCarthy's hope Steeplejacks will appeal to area college students and their parents. "It's extremely difficult for someone on a college budget to find a good and inexpensive place to take a date. Steeplejacks is ideal. We're even on the bus route."

In addition to the fine menu, Steeplejacks has a fairly extensive and ever expanding wine list. The McCarthy's also offer vegetarian and "light" dishes.

Steeplejack's decor is most unique, featuring the work of a different local artist every six weeks.

"Customers of the old Steeplejacks seem very happy with what we've done so far," Kim said. "We want everyone to feel comfortable here, but we also want it to be an exciting place to eat. We'll always be introducing something new."

Steeplejacks is located on Rt. 116 in the center of Sunderland. Reservations can be made by calling 665-7980.

Bobs to bring skewed musical vision to Iron Horse

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

I used to believe that kicking back with a bowl of Pepperidge Farm goldfish while listening to the Bobs on CD was the highest state of spiritual fulfillment that a person could achieve with their parents still in the house.

Then I saw them in concert, last spring at the Iron Horse Cafe in Northhampton.

Gunnar "Bob" Madsen, Janie "Bob" Scott, Matthew "Bob" Stull, and Richard "Bob" Green (in all instances, "Bob" stands for "Best of Breed," as in dog show terminology), return to the cozy Iron Horse for four shows split over two evenings, tonight and tomorrow at 7 and 10 pm.

On stage, the Bobs' psychadelic acid acappella style suffers none from the absence of studio engineering effects. Your eyes don't lie; the audio gymnastics that make a Bobs albumn an apocalyptic audio experience are not the result of recording wizardry - those are their real voices, devoid of musical or technical props.

From their first album, entitled simply The Bobs, a frantic cover of the Beatles' Helter Skelter was nominated for a Grammy. The Bobs have also recorded "interpretations" of "Psyco Killer" by the Talking Heads, and "Little Red Riding Hood" by Little Anthony and the Imperials. On stage, an occasional Elvis Costello or Led Zeppelin cover ("Whole Lotta Love" is a favorite) is never out of the question.

While these songs give a yardstick against which the band's manic vocal accuracy may be measured, it is the truly original songs off their two albums that find the Bobs well out of the creative mainstream.

From their first albumn, "Bus Plunge" tells the story of an amphetamine-fueled bus driver desperately trying to maintain altitude. "Trash," "I Hate the Beach Boys," and "Cowboy Lips," are equally twisted Bobs tales, told in their trademark frantic acappella style.

The Bobs are currently touring to promote their second albumn, My I'm Large, which includes equally skewed songs about obsessive relationships ("My Husband Was a Weatherman" and "Please Let Me Be Your Third World Country"), as well as "Mopping, Mopping, Mopping"— a first person account of the hardships endured by the resident of a hurricane-prone household.

So bring an open mind to the Iron Horse to experience the Bobs. Goldfish are optional.

Performing Arts offers workout

By SUSAN RICHARDSON
Collegian Correspondent

For those who are bored with traditional aerobic workouts, the Performing Arts Division offers a stimulating and original alternative called Dance Exercise.

The class is taught by Elsje Sturtevant three times a week in Old Chapel and the atmosphere is friendly and intimate. "It's very relaxed and not at all competitive," Sturtevant said. "Nobody's self-conscious and there's a great sense of being part of a group." It is a group which comprises several UMass students, some staff members and a number of people from the local community as well. Dance Exercise seems to be a class which suits all ages and abilities.

"The class has a balletic slant but it uses other exercise methods, too, to get a rounded physical workout," Sturtevant explained. It opens with a series of ballet movements at the barre to improve posture. She takes her students through this section slowly, paying special attention to those who have had no previous ballet training. She encourages them continually: "You'll get there. If you can't do it this time, you'll be able to do that little bit extra next week."

There follows a twenty-minute aerobic section, which again includes some ballet movements, as well as steps from traditional dances such as waltzes and mazurkas. "This is very good for coordination," Sturtevant said. "It keeps people interested, too, because we change the steps all the time. They're usually so busy concentrating that they don't realize they've been on the move for twenty minutes!"

Finally, Sturtevant moves onto floor exercises, where the emphasis is on stretching and strengthening leg and abdominal muscles. At this point, she tells her class, "The whole reason for exercise is to do just what your body particularly needs," and she is able to advise and correct the technique of each individual member of the class. She is convinced that an improvement in the students' overall performance will result over an extended period of time. "Provided that they stick with it; that is, these days people tend to want instant gratification. If you want results from this class you have to have patience."

Judging by Sturvetant's professional approach and her students' enthusiasm, it seems likely that participating in this Dance Exercise class would be rewarding indeed.

Jamming on campus: where you can play

By ROB SKELTON
Collegian Staff

Where to go if you're a musician who wishes to share the gift, or an aficionado who wishes to indulge? On the UMass campus there are many places. To start with one of the more popular, there is the Hatch. Almost every night there is programming of one sort or another, and, while those at the bar seldom pay much attention, there are always plenty of Third World engineering students doing homework who don't mind checking out a bad band or two. Kidding aside, some great bands have played the Hatch, including Curtis T. and the Kick, the Malarians, Circle, Outskirts and the Spaceheaters. The Hatch is free and the beers are cheap and the bands play for pizza, beer and exposure.

The Top of the Campus Lounge is a great place to catch mellow music by assorted singer-songwriter-musician types. Sometimes the Board of Governors sponsors a show on the concourse; in the past, the BOG put on shows at the "Flagstone Cafe" which was located outside the Blue Wall.

Dormitory coffeehouses, of course, are where some of the seminal talent emerges here at UMass. Every dorm has 'em. Everyone should check 'em out. Additionally, area governments sponsor seasonal shows: Central's Octoberfest, Orchard Hill's Bowl Day, Backyard Rock 'n' roll at Sylvan.

There is a little-known arm of Housing called Residential Arts which has money to produce arts and music events. One of these events is the Eastside Concert, which has become, perhaps, the most exciting, free, large-scale event on campus, featuring Fishbone and the Red Hot Chili Peppers last spring. The Southwest concerts and UPC spring shows just don't cut it for intimacy like the Eastside show does.

There used to be a group on campus known as the UMass Musicians Guild, which helped in organizing gigs for musicians. Perhaps it will pop up again following this article. Any other suggestions? Contact me at the Collegian, 113 Campus Center.

Paxton sings about all

Folksinger/songwriter Tom Paxton will be performing at Buckley Recital Hall at Amherst College on Friday, Oct.14 at 8:15 p.m.

Paxton has been performing his music, which has been mostly political, since he first started playing in Greenwich Village coffeehouses, for over 20 years, with 25 solo albums to his credit. His recent songs have dealt with Gary Hart, the Reagans, the Pentagon, Yuppies and computers, as well as airport baggage handlers.

Other, non-political songs include "Ramblin' Boy" and "The Last Thing on My Mind". The latter has been performed by such artists as Dolly Parton and Joan Baez.

Tickets for the show are available at Food for Thought Books, Inc. and the Jeffrey Amherst Bookstore in Amherst; the Globe Bookshop in Northampton and World Eye Bookshop in Greenfield. Remaining tickets will be sold at the door 45 minutes before the concert begins. Tickets are $9 for the general public and $7 for senior citizens and area students with IDs.

This show is being sponsored by Amnesty International.

Carribean culture at gallery

University photojournalist Stan Sherer will be featuring an exhibition of his photographs, titled Journey into the Soul: the Spiritual Baptists of Barbados, at the Augusta Savage Gallery in New Africa House from Oct.12 to Nov.12.

Archbishop Granville Williams of Barbados will be a featured guest at the opening, which will take place on Oct.12 from 5p.m.-7 p.m. at the Gallery. Williams founded the Sons of God Apostolic.

Spiritual Baptist Church in 1957, and his consecration in January, 1988 as archbishop was the occasion for Sherer's visit to the Caribbean nation.

Also featured at the reception will be a lecture by Dr.Ezra Griffith of Yale University, author of several articles about the Spiritual Baptists; composer Onwin S. Primus Borde's musical tribute to the Archbishop and a performance of Caribbean folk songs and dances by Cheryl Byron.

The Augusta Savage Gallery is open Monday-Friday, 10 a.m.-4 p.m. and by appointment. For information about appointments, call the Gallery at 545-0932.

Metallica will not die

By CHRISTOPHER PARK
Collegian Correspondent

And Justice For All
Metallica
Elektra

Since 1982, the band Metallica has been growing in status, particularly after the release of their very successful Master of Puppets LP. Despite the loss of bass guitarist Cliff Burton (killed in a tragic bus accident during their 1986 European tour), they've pressed on, led by the guitar heroics of Kirk Hammett, and their success continues to grow at a record pace.

Metallica's fourth album, And Justice For All, is out, and ready to do more incorporated damage to the airwaves. I was lucky enough to have picked up a copy recently. As I played the record, I could faintly hear the first song, "Blackened", co-written by new bassist Jason Newsted. Unaware of the fade-in introduction, I put the volume up to 7 and left the room. When I came back, I could hear the pleasant, hard-driving, and very loud beat of Metallica through the speakers. My roommate screamed at me: "Yo man, turn that crap down! It's killing my ears!" I knew that Metallica had done good (my rommate likes that "Bedtime Magic" stuff)

Just like the harmonic introductions on Ride the Lightning and Master of Puppets, Metallica had surprised me once again: this time by fading into their songs.

Each cut on And Justice For All has its own personality and emotion. For instance, "The Frayed Ends of Sanity" starts off with a familiar sound effect from the Wizard of Oz, when the evil guards are marching into the castle (it's that "O-Wee-O..." part). An example of emotion and feel is "To Live is to Die". Much like "Fade to Black" and "Orion", from the previous albums, its melodramatic power and rich harmonic textures carry the song fully despite the absence of vocals (save for the one spoken verse).

"Harvester of Sorrow" solidifies Metallica's position as a strong, rhythmicly oriented band. The unique, clean guitar "crunch" is ideal for moshing (agressive, metal-type slam dancing) in the pit.

"One" is a semi-ballad sung in the point of view of a veteran in a coma. Very touching stuff. The anthemic title track features an unusual drum part, and "Eye of the Beholder" and "The Shortest Straw" are two very society based songs that will knock your socks right off. Both songs reflect on the grim world we live in.

The lead guitar wizardry of Kirk Hammett, brought to the rock-n-roll forefront on this Summer's Monster Of Rock tour, once again is a key component in Metallica's relentless heavy duty formula. Combine this with James Hetfield's vocal attack and steady rhythm guitar work, and the recipe is completed.

The last cut, "Dyer's Eve", is a youthful, energetic, and rebellious tune, great for kids with an identity crisis.

All in all, you shouldn't be disappointed by this two record set. For $8.99, you get nine beautiful, melodic, innovative, rhythmic, thrashing chansons. Most of the tracks, over six minutes long, should give real metalheads years of enjoyment. In fact, I still can't get enough of Metallica's first Kill 'Em All LP. So my advice to headbangers is to mosh on down to the nearest record shop, plunk down a few bucks, and judge the case of And Justice For All for yourself.

The win raised the Minutewomen's record in the A-10 to 3-0 and clinched first place in the A-10 East Division.

"We only gave four corners in the whole game but they (Temple) had two breakaways that Cindy played perfectly," Hixon said.

Errors by the Owl defense cost them dearly. UMass capitalized on three mistakes by the Temple backs.

The first one came at 22:07 of the first half when freshman Dawn Trumbauer broke in on sophomore goalie Jill Marple to score her second goal of the season and give the Minutewomen a 1-0 lead.

The second mistake came at 26:31 when an Owl committed a foul, giving UMass a penalty corner. On the resulting play, senior Julie Stuart picked up the ball and lifted it over Marple for a 2-0 UMass lead. Junior Bernadette Martel assisted on the play. The Minutewomen carried that lead into halftime.

The third mistake which drove the Owls into the ground was a foul that the officials awarded a penalty stroke to UMass for. Junior Kathy DeAngelis took the stroke for the Minutewomen and beat Marple at 8:37 of the second half to give UMass a 3-0 lead.

At 17:16 of the second, senior co-captain Ruth Vasapolli received a pass from junior Mara Fratassio and added another insurance goal to give UMass a 4-0 lead.

At 23:02, Kathy Tierney scored to ruin Cox's shutout and bring Temple within three goals with just under 12 minutes left at 4-1.

The final statistics of the game showed UMass dominance. The Minutewomen outshot Temple 22-8, drew 10 penalty corners as opposed to the Owls' four. Cox registered six saves while her counterpart, Marple, ended up with 14.

Slap shots: Cox now has 59 saves on the season and has nine shutouts while leading the A-10 in goaltending with a 0.28 goals against average. She was named A-10 Player-of-the-Week for last week for leading UMass to a 2-1 record and a 0.38 goals against average in 185 minutes. It was the third week in a row that a UMass player has won the honor.

"We decided to go with the wind . . . to really play an up-tempo half," said UMass coach Jeff Gettler. "We possessed the ball, we kept in their end, but we never threatened the goal."

The Minutemen attempted four corner kicks, and squeezed off just four shots on goal in the half.

When the teams switched sides following the half, control of the ball followed the wind. The Rams scored twice within a span of three minutes, midway through the second half, to secure the win.

"We tried to play a 4-4-2 (alignment) . . . knowing that they'd probably have more territory and be in our end more, and they were," said Gettler.

At the 74 minute mark, URI's center forward floated a loose ball into the upper reaches of the net, past UMass goaltender Sam Ginzburg. The play resulted from a corner kick that dropped into the confusion in front of UMass's goal, and never cleared.

Three minutes later Ginzburg was unable to handle a long range drive from a URI midfielder, and the Rams were able to punch home the rebound.

National League umpire Harry Wendelstedt throws Dodger relief pitcher Jay Howell out of Game 3 of the N.L. Championship Series Saturday for having an illegal substance on his glove. Despite the loss of Howell, the Dodgers have won the last two games to take a 3-2 lead in the series.

Down 2-0, and against the wind, the Minutemen were unable to summon a comeback bid. Offensive-minded fullback Dan Lawrence came as close as anyone to beating URI goaltender Lance Klima, going face to face with the All-New England candidate on a pair of long distance feeds off of free kicks. Steve Cesnek also saw a scoring bid pound off a URI defender.

"We were sagging, mentally and physically we were really letting down," said Gettler of his team's second-half effort. "We lacked a little leadership. When the game was there to be won Rhode Island grabbed it and we didn't. I'm very dissapointed with our performance."

"The second half was the worst half of soccer we've played," agreed senior sweeper Michael McCormick, who also cited UMass apparrent lack of intensity. "If the other team seems to give more of the play, our heads get out of the game," said the team captain.

The inevitable letdown that follows such a dissapointing loss as the Minutemen experienced on Sunday may be offset by the appearance of regional rival University of Connecticut on Upper Boyden field Wednesday afternoon at 3 p.m. In Martin's words "If this team can't get excited to play UConn, there's no motivating them."

"St. Bonaventure served and made it as difficult as possible to beat them," Ford said. "We really should have [beaten St. Bonaventure in three games]."

They did, and it was off to Penn State.

"The scores don't indicate how well we played. To me, Penn State didn't play well and their coach [Russ Rose] said they didn't play well against URI," Ford said.

But that is testimony as to how good the Lady Lions are. On a so-so day, they keep an opponent from winning more than 11 points.

"They aren't in the top 20 now, but they should be," Ford said.

The Minutewomen were hustling around the court but couldn't turn opportunities into points, according to Ford.

"We were getting the side-outs but we weren't getting the points. We can still play with these teams," Ford said. "We were playing good defense but they were literally hitting over the top of our blocks."

"We're just not of that caliber."

■ football

"That's the way our team is," Palazzi said. "Someone always steps up to do the job. Today the defense needed to bear down and they did. This week and last [when UMass shut out Boston University in the second half], they've really done the job."

And no one was more satisfied than the defensive players themselves.

"You practice like you play. It carries over," Cullen said. "The coaches have been pleased with the way we've been practicing. We're getting some confidence and its helping."

"Today was a key because we needed to assert ourselves on defense to make us a team," UMass head coach Jim Reid said. "Our defense hit as well as it has all year. We played tough, hard-nosed football."

Karelas led UMass with 16 tackles, while linebackers John McKeown and Matt Tulley added 12 each.

The Rams defense was stingy, too. The only UMass score in the first half came on a broken play. On a fourth-and-7 from the URI 16, the Minutemen set up for a field goal attempt.

But when the snap from center was high, Palazzi, the holder, rolled right and, just before stepping out of bounds, lofted a pass that 6-foot-6 tight end Dimitri Yavis pulled down in the back right corner of the end zone.

"When something goes wrong, David yells fire and all the receivers go out. They know where to go and where to look," Reid said. "It was perfect coverage, it's just that our guy is 6-6.

"That play was luck, but luck is when preparation meets opportunity."

The Rams blew their first real opportunity in the game. On a first-and-goal from the 2 late in the first half, fullback Sean Donovan coughed up the ball and UMass' Garrick Amos recovered in the end zone.

But after Smith's third interception, the Rams got on the board. With 40 seconds left in the half, fullback Tony Lowe bulled in from the 1, and Chris Cassara's extra point tied the score 7-7.

But that was it for the Rams, as the UMass defense held them to just 78 yards in the second half to preserve the team's third straight win.

"Last week we were 3-1 but I felt we weren't good enough to be 3-1," Reid said. "I said we were pretenders, not contenders. Today we came together as a team."

Extra points: Tulley's performance earned him Yankee Conference Rookie of the Week honors. . . Smith's interceptions tied a Yankee Conference record for interceptions in a game, held by UMass' Steve Rogers (vs. Delaware in 1968) and Maine's Dave Brown (vs. Bowdoin in 1962). . . Olson's run was the longest from scrimmage for UMass this year.

As long as it had to happen to someone: UConn's big gun, quarterback Matt DeGennaro, sustained a rib cage muscle pull against Villanova Saturday and may not be able to play against UMass this week.

■ women's soccer ties UConn

UMass has not had many pleasant encounters with turf this year. Just when they thought that the fake stuff was in their past, the rain made the UConn field slick, and pushed up the pace of the game.

"We had them under seige a few times," Gozley said. "I'd say we controlled about 80 minutes of the game."

Goalkeeper Carla DeSantis registered nine saves over the 110 minutes of play, posting her seventh shutout in nine games.

As has been the case with most opponents this year, UConn was up to face the Minutewomen. The fact that the eighth-ranked Huskies are a traditional rival for UMass didn't help.

UMass rolls over Rhode Island, 26-7

Defense shines as team wins third straight

By MATT GERKE
Collegian Staff

KINGSTON, R.I. — For the first three games of the season, the defensive players of the University of Massachusetts football team got pushed around.

The last two games, they have pushed back — hard.

The Minuteman defense stifled the University of Rhode Island Saturday as UMass posted a 26-7 victory over the Rams. With the win, UMass finds itself 4-1, with a perfect 3-0 record and a share of first place in the Yankee Conference. Villanova is also 3-0.

"If we can't be 5-0, I guess we'll take 4-1," senior quarterback Dave Palazzi said after Saturday's win. "And 3-0 in this conference isn't bad. We're staying ahead."

They have done it in different ways, with different heroes almost every game. Saturday Palazzi wasn't on, and the defense picked up the slack, holding the Rams to 251 yards of total offense.

"Through the first three games [when UMass gave up 114 points], we were giving 100 percent," said senior noseguard Joe Cullen, who had six tackles Saturday. "But we gave up the big play. We're a little young and now we're starting to gel."

Rhode Island, 2-4 and 1-3 in the conference, found that out Saturday as the Minutemen made a cold, dreary day even more miserable for the Rams.

The weather conditions limited the UMass offense. Without full use of the option play, and with the top two fullbacks both out with injuries, the offense was not as powerful as it had been in the first four games.

"The weather took us out of a lot of stuff on offense. We couldn't make cuts," said Palazzi, who threw four interceptions, all to Ram cornerback Kevin Smith. "I thought [the interceptions] were good passes, but maybe I underthrew one or two of them."

It was that kind of day. Rhode Island's troubles were not with throwing, but rather holding on to the ball, as the team lost seven fumbles.

> Last week we were 3-1 but I felt we weren't good enough to be 3-1. I said we were pretenders, not contenders. Today we came together as a team.
> —UMass head coach Jim Reid

And the UMass defense took advantage, ending one URI drive by pouncing on a loose ball and scoring a touchdown on another.

"We're showing we can be a good defense," cornerback Vaughn Williams said. "And the defense wanted to win this game."

Williams made his biggest contribution to the win early in the third quarter. When the Rams lined up for first and 10 from their own 5-yard-line, quarterback Steve Monaco pitched out to tailback Mike Rogers.

Williams pursued, stripped the ball from Rogers, and dove on the ball to put the Minutemen up 13-7.

"We worked all week on stopping the toss sweep," Williams said. "My job on that play is to force the play inside and take on the fullback but he cut upfield. I just tried to make something happen."

Fullback Steve Olson had a 51-yard touchdown run Saturday as the Minutemen defeated Rhode Island, 26-7.

Besides turning out to be the winning points, Williams' touchdown also did much to deflate Rhode Island.

"The fumbles were too much," URI head coach Bob Griffin said. "To lose possession near the goal line is a killer. I don't know whether it was that play in the end zone, but there was a definite shift in momentum and control of the game."

The control shifted to the UMass defense. On the next set of downs, the Rams reached the UMass 34 before sacks by George Karelas and Steve Brothers moved them back to the 44 and forced them to punt.

"After that touchdown in the second half, their defense got stronger and more confident, and made life harder for us," Griffin said.

On the Rams' next possession, UMass stopped them on three downs and forced a punt; on the following Ram series, Karelas recovered a fumble to give the Minutemen the ball on the URI 14.

Four plays later, Kevin Smellie took a pitch and scored from the 1 to make it 19-7.

Chris Poirier fumbled the ensuing kickoff and kicker Marco Gabrielli recovered to give UMass the ball at the URI 28.

After the Minutemen turned the ball over on downs, the Rams ran three plays and punted to the UMass 49. And on the first play, fourth-string fullback Steve Olson blasted through a hole and went 51 yards to finish the scoring.

Volleyball splits two A-10 matches

By RONN GARRY

The University of Massachusetts volleyball team's competition went full circle this weekend — from sardines to caviar, from the first floor to the penthouse, and from St. Bonaventure University to Penn State University.

The Minutewomen saw the worst and best of teams in the Atlantic 10 conference in just 24 hours.

On Friday, UMass lowered the boom on the Bonnies 15-5, 15-9, 15-12 and then slammed into the Penn St. wall 3-15, 4-15, 4-15.

Tonight, the Minutewomen will get right back to work, when they face the Crusaders of Holy Cross College at 7 p.m. in the Totman Gymnasium.

"We are not going to take them lightly, they went four games with the University of Rhode Island," Ford said. "We should be ready and fairly rested. Being home the next couple of weekends will help.

This weekend's road trip began against St. Bonaventure (6-9, 0-4 in the A-10), a young team struggling to keep pace with the rest of the conference. Next was Penn State (18-1, 4-0 in the A-10), an incredibly balanced, experienced, and veteran team that has dominated the conference for the past five years.

The Minutewomen began the road trip with a eight hour bus ride to Olean N.Y. to face an improved and enthusiastic, but outmatched Bonaventure team.

"A lot of teams have beaten St. Bonaventure 15-1, 15-2, but they have really improved," UMass coach Carol Ford said.

UMass didn't show any signs of weariness from the long trip, according to Ford, as the Minutewomen played their best game of the match in the first game.

"We did everything well, passed well, played good defense — everyone made a contribution and played tough," Ford said.

In the second game, "St. Bonaventure improved. I'm giving credit to them, they played well," Ford said.

UMass was forced in the third game to hold off a desperate St. Bonaventure team.

The Bonnies were anxious to save some pride while UMass wanted to finish off SBU as quickly as possible and save some energy for Saturday's clash against Penn State.

Field hockey wins, ties

Clinches first in A-10 East

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

All year long, University Of Massachusetts field hockey coach Pam Hixon has said that she is not concerned with national rankings this early in the season.

This weekend showed one reason why Hixon does not get herself wrapped up in the polls.

Saturday, the Minutewomen handled Temple University, 4-1, on Temple's artificial turf field. The Owls were ranked No. 15 in the country by the NCAA.

But on Sunday, UMass played at West Chester University on a grass field, which the Minutewomen are more used to, and were battled to a 0-0 tie by the 20th-ranked Golden Rams.

UMass, which came into the weekend ranked No. 3 in the nation and No. 1 in New England, is now 10-1-1 on the season.

In the West Chester game, the second overtime ended with no one able to break Golden Ram goaltender Shelley Stevens or UMass goalie Cindy Cox.

Both teams had equal opportunity to win the game in overtime, each drawing two penalty corners. But Cox and Stevens just would not make a mistake, both making two saves to preserve their team's chances of winning.

The Minutewomen outshot the Golden Rams by an 18-8 margin in regulation but Stevens turned them away with 11 saves. Cox was only forced to make six saves for UMass.

UMass drew 10 penalty corners in the game as opposed to West Chester's six but just couldn't put the ball in the net. Having played two games in 24 hours might have contributed to the lack of production from the Minutewomen's attack.

"West Chester long-balled us to death," Hixon said. "They looked fresh, we looked a little tired. We had our chances, we just didn't capitalize."

UMass had no problem putting the ball in the net on Saturday though as four different players scored a goal for UMass against Atlantic 10 Conference rival Temple.

A disappointing soccer weekend

• Women tie UConn, 0-0

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

Saturday's women's soccer game between the University of Massachusetts and the University of Connecticut was supposed to prove who was the better of the two in New England.

Unfortunately, the result was inconclusive, as the teams sloshed to a 0-0 tie in a windy, cold rain at Storrs, Conn.

But the Minutewomen can put that game behind them now, as they prepare to face Dartmouth College this afternoon at Boyden Field at 3 p.m.

According to UMass assistant coach Lisa Gozley, Dartmouth comes in with its best team. The Big Green are led by co-captain Chris Gates, who owns the school scoring record.

Needless to say, Saturday's weather wasn't tailor-made for anything short of mud football. The conditions played a role in what was the biggest game of the season so far for the third-ranked Minutewomen. With the tie, UMass is now 8-0-1.

"The weather was a factor," said Gozley. "It was cold, and it made the field more like turf."

• Men stopped by URI, 2-0

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

On a windswept field Sunday in Kingston, R.I., the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team saw its last avenue to post-season play shut tight by the Rams of Rhode Island, as the Minutemen were beaten by their Atlantic-10 rivals 2-0.

The loss dropped UMass' season record to 7-5, and its league tally to 1-2. Neither will qualify the Minutemen for an at-large invitation to the post-season Atlantic 10 tournmament, and a shot at the NCAAs.

"This loss annhilated our chance of any post season play," said UMass assistant coach John Martin.

A lack of intensity and an equally sparse ability to score once again combined to down the Minutemen on the road, where they have posted a 1-4 record this season.

The UMass offense, which rolled into Sunday's contest having scored 10 times in its previous three contests, mustered a mere 10 shots against the Rams in the game.

Most importantly, the Minutemen were unable to break through the Ram defense in the first half, when the strong sea breeze was to their advantage.

Regents award raise to Jenifer

By COLLEGIAN NEWS SERVICES

BOSTON — The state Board of Regents yesterday voted to give Chancellor of Higher Education Franklyn G. Jenifer a $12,000 raise, setting his salary at $112,000 per year.

The board also approved the distribution of $10 million raised in tuition hikes to public colleges and universities.

Regents increased tuition at the state's 29 public institutions by about 8.5 percent in May and received legislative approval to retain the extra tuition earned through the increase. Tuition from state schools generally reverts to the state treasury.

"Given the fact that there are probably not going to be any major budget increases in the next few years, in order for the state's colleges and universities to get better, they needed another source of revenue," said Terry Zoulas, spokesman for the Regents.

The Regents' Compliance Unit will audit how each school uses new funds, and school presidents are prohibited from spending any money raised through the tuition hike on permanent staff or faculty salaries or facility operating costs, such as heat or electricity bills.

Jenifer's raise comes at a time when cutbacks in state aid have forced public colleges and universities to trim their enrollments, a situation he has called "a very serious problem."

The raise increases the Chancellor's pay by $47,000 since he took the post two years ago. In 1987, Jenifer's salary was boosted to $100,000, the bottom of the $100,000 to $150,000 range set by new legislation.

Three world-renowned evolutionary biologists will tackle "Three-and-a-half billion years on Earth" in a special University of Massachusetts convocation to be held at 4 p.m. today in the Campus Center Auditorium.

The convocation will feature a series of short lectures by three of the foremost authorities in the life sciences —Lynn Margulis, William Chaloner and Peter Raven. Raven will receive an honorary Doctorate of Sciences degree by University President David C. Knapp following the event.

"This convocation addresses extremely important contemporary topics of scientific and historical significance," said Chancellor Joseph Duffey, who will preside at the event.

A member of the National Academy of Sciences and Distinguished University Professor of Botany, Margulis will discuss "The First Three Billion Years—The Five Kingdoms of Life."

Author of more than 130 scientific papers and seven books, Margulis came to the University this fall from Boston University, where she was a professor of biology.

"We are delighted to welcome Professor Lynn Margulis to our campus with this convocation," said Duffey.

Margulis is internationally recognized as one of the

Civility Day planned for Oct. 27

In commemoration of the brawl which erupted two years ago after the Boston Red Sox lost a World Series game to the New York Mets, the University of Massachusetts is holding Civility Day on Oct. 27.

An annual rededication of the campus to civility was among the recommendations made by Judge Frederick Hurst of the Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination in the aftermath of the incident which he judged to be racially motivated.

The three purposes of the day are to raise awareness of racism, celebrate multicultural diversity, and highlight existing programs and activities that foster an atmosphere of openness and tolerance on campus.

"In previous years we've had people put on events for the campus," said Grant Ingle of the Human Relations Office. Ingle and other members of a committee broadly representative of the University community are coordinating a week of events beginning Oct. 21 and culminating on the day.

House crashes

Traffic was stalled for more than seven hours yesterday when a modular prison cell unit struck a concrete barrier on Route 91 southbound in Northampton, tearing the unit from its frame, police said. No one was injured.

The accident occurred when the prison cell unit, approximately 14 feet wide, tried to pass between two concrete "jersey" barricades that were about 13 feet apart.

Corporal Pinkham of the Northampton barracks of the state police said the unit was riding on axles and was similar to a "modular home taken apart and put together at the site."

Pinkham said the accident occurred near Exit 20 at about 2 p.m. and was cleared at about 7:30 p.m.

"The frame was torn from the body, and heavy equipment was used to clear the wreck," he said.

Senators try to oust Piccirillo

By YANA DLUGY
Collegian Staff

Student Government Association officials have criticized SGA Clerk of Courts Paul Piccirillo for some time and are now requesting his resignation.

Commuter Area Government President Jay Festa placed a motion demanding Piccirillo's resignation on the agenda for tonight's meeting of the Undergraduate Student Senate.

However Senate Speaker Robert Fadel said the item may not even make it to the senate floor. He said if the senate ratifies yesterday's elections the motion may not be voted on because the senate will be in "new session."

Festa said he wants Piccirillo out because he considers him incompetent and unprofessional. He said he was astonished at how Piccirillo acted during the Sept. 25 hearing concerning the Coordinating Committee. The committee, which acts as the senate over the summer, approved the election results of Shari Silkoff and Jason Rabinowitz as SGA co-presidents.

"I was amazed at the pure incompetence if not the maliciousness of his actions," Festa said.

Festa said during the hearing Piccirillo discussed the case with a witness, former Attorney General Bill Collins, and on a number of occasions goaded the justices.

Piccirillo said he was not discussing the case with Collins, but simply asking him a question. He said he did not remember the exact content of the question.

He also said part of his job is to answer any questions the justices may have and insisted that is exactly what he was doing during the hearing.

Festa is not the first to complain about Piccirillo's performance as Clerk of Courts.

At the first senate meeting this semester Fadel listed a number of problems he had with the Coordinating Committee hearing. Fadel, a member of the committee, was among the members of the committee publicly censured in that case determination.

Fadel said the subpoenas for the hearing were not issued until 5 p.m. the Friday before, which did not give the defendants any time to prepare for the case. He also said because the hearing was scheduled on a Sunday it was in violation of Massachusetts General Law and the First and 14th Amendments of the US Constitution.

John Sanchez, a former justice who served two years, said the clerk is supposed to be very objective and said he had doubts about Piccirillo's objectivity.

"You can't do somebody else's paperwork first," Sanchez said. "You can't call a meeting knowing full well that it's going to cause a problem for the other side, which is exactly what he did that Sunday."

Sanchez said Piccirillo did not notify the justices for the hearing until very late, and two of the justices had never sat on a case before.

Pamela Hickey, the presiding justice in the case, said she was very surprised she was presiding, since she only sat on one case last semester.

She said she, along with the other two justices, was contacted to sit on the panel at the last minute, which seemed strange to her.

"It's not normal to contact everyone at the last minute," Hickey said. "It's one thing if it's another person, but the whole board."

Candidates spar prior to second debate

WASHINGTON, D.C. (AP) — George Bush and Michael Dukakis courted the support of Italian-Americans in competing Columbus Day appearances yesterday that left plenty of time to polish their lines in private for this weeks; second and final presidential campaign debate.

Both camps said they expected the 90-minute debate to be held at 9 p.m. EDT Thursday night on the campus of UCLA, and the presidential rivals were flying to the West Coast today to prepare.

Dukakis spent his morning in New York with Gov. Mario Cuomo and John F. Kennedy Jr. The Democratic candidate marched in the annual Columbus Day parade in New York City after first proposing a program to ease the way into the housing market for first-time home buyers.

"George Bush has no housing program. He has no solutions," the Democrat said in a speech in Levittown, a Long Island community that was the embodiment of the post-World War II boom in affordable housing. "He has no new ideas."

But Bush does have a lead in the nationwide public opinion polls, and the vice president pointed with satisfaction to weekend surveys rating him the leader across the South and in scattered other states.

The Republican candidate street-campaigned in New Jersey, walking through an Italian neighborhood in south Trenton before delivering a speech on crime.

"Frankly, law abiding Americans are fed up with the cruel and unusual punishment inflicted on them by those who are soft on crime," the vice president said.

While refraining from the type of harsh attack on Dukakis' crime record that has become a regular part of his campaigning, Bush criticized "liberal thinkers" who he said "thought it was compassionate to lighten up on sentencing to allow early releases and furloughs".

That was a muted remark directed at the Masasachusetts prison furlough program that Bush has repeatedly criticized during the campaign. In one infamous incident, a murderer out of jail on a furlough escaped and brutally attacked a Maryland couple.

Resignation to be proposed

Clerk of Courts under fire

By GEORGE FRANCY
Collegian Staff

Student Government Association Clerk of Courts Paul Piccirillo may be asked to resign as a result of a proposal being heard in tonight's Undergraduate Student Senate meeting.

This request for resignation may be held up, however, if the senate decides to ratify yesterday's senatorial election results. Results were not available at press time.

If the election results are ratified, installing new senators, the request for Piccirillo's resignation becomes business of the former senate, and is effectively "dead," according to Student Trustee Stephanie Orefice.

Senator Jay Festa is requesting Piccirillo's resignation because of what he terms "unprofessional" behavior by the Clerk of Courts. Festa said he is not sure the proposal will be heard tonight.

Festa said a hearing of the Student Supreme Court on Sept. 25. was illegal because it was held on a Sunday. "A lot of it has to do with the Sunday hearing," he said. "He also didn't give notice to the people being complained about," Festa said of Piccirillo.

"As clerk of courts, he is only there in an administrative capacity, he's not there to coach the justices or talk to witnesses," Festa said. He claims Piccirillo did both during the hearing.

Piccirillo sees the request to remove him as a political move to make it easier to install Shari Silkoff and Jason Rabinowitz as co-presidents of the SGA. The issue of the co-presidents is currently stuck in the courts, pending a decision.

"They probably want to see someone in office as president," Piccirillo said. "It's obviously politically motivated. Any unbiased person can see that I have been doing my job."

Piccirillo said he was appointed last semester by the justices for the Student Judiciary. If the proposal to ask for his resignation is approved, it would have no binding power to remove Piccirillo.

Also on yesterday's ballot was a referendum question asking whether the police sub-station in Washington Residence Hall should be removed.

Five-college area gets grant to research methods of teaching calculus

By JENNIFER McKINNEY
Collegian Correspondent

Five College, Inc. received last month a grant of $714,000 from the National Science Foundation (NSF) to restructure the way calculus is taught at the undergraduate level, both here at the University of Massachusetts and nationwide.

This five-year grant for the program, "Calculus in Context," was the only five-year proposal that received NSF funds.

"This is incredibly exciting," said Frank Wattenberg, mathematics professor here at the UMass. "There is a number of different things coming together . . . it's time to revise how and what we are teaching in calculus. It has basically been taught the same way for over 50 years."

The grant will support the two primary phases of the project, according to a Five College press release. During the first three years, writing, teaching and revising versions of each course in the three-semester calculus sequence will be top priority. A reduction in teaching assignments will be given to the Five College mathematicians. During the summer recess, texts will be revised and computer software produced to take the place of those still being used both at colleges and high schools.

During the last two years of the project, distribution of the lessons learned will be stressed. Course concepts, materials, and structures of the curricular sequence will be presented in concentrated summer workshops to other mathematicians in the five colleges and to faculty members from colleges and universities from all over the United States. "We plan to bring in other people to see what we've done," Wattenberg said.

The initiators and directors of the program are professors from each of the five colleges: Wattenberg; James Callahan, of Smith College; David Cox, of Amherst College; Kenneth Hoffmann, of Hampshire College and Donald O'Shea and Lester Senechal of Mount Holyoke College.

The recent advance of computer technology has considerably affected the application of mathematics to many sciences, Five College professors pointed out to the NSF in their proposal.

Professor Callahan stated, "We intend to create a course that offers more that is directly useful to students in all the sciences from physics to economics."

Now, three or four applications will be taught rather than 700, as it was previously. Students will have a better feel for what they are studying. It is a lot more realistic, said Wattenberg.

"We now have a lot more computers than we did before," Wattenberg said. "We (UMass) have a powerful graphics facility that makes it easier for students to visualize what they are studying. It makes it more interesting, less abstract."

According to Wattenberg, $140,000 will be received the first year to be distributed among the various projects connected to "Calculus in Context". "There is a tremendous amount of excitement and interest going on in the Math department," he said.

When asked what is now being done to start the program, Wattenberg said that work was just starting to be done including getting course materials together.

Carol Angus, assistant coordinator at Five Colleges, Inc., expressed her feelings on the program, saying, "I am pleased that our mathematicians have this opportunity to make such an important contribution.

Budget cuts cause problems for Mathnet

Computer network assists teachers

By JONATHON WAXLER
Collegian Correspondent

A program that was created to help improve math instructing skills with the aid of computers is having problems because of state budget cuts.

Mathnet is a telecommunications service available free of charge to mathematics educators in elementary and secondary schools across the state. The program was created by University of Massachusetts Professor of Education Richard Masalski, who is on sabattical until January. He believes computer networks offer "a golden opportunity to really take advantage of the skills teachers have to reach more students more efficiently."

The major problem with the system is the Board of Regents of Higher Education cut all funding to the program which included a toll free number. Now all long distance phone charges must be incurred by the user, and therefore less calls are being made into the system, said John Sieks, a UMass math professor.

"It is a shame that we publicize this system and finally get people to start calling in and them the Board of Regents cuts all funding, forcing us to lose the '800' number and therefore several users," he said. "It seems like a service to the Commonwealth that ought to be funded by the Commonwealth."

A new budget is being drawn up and hopefully the program will soon get money, Sieks said. "We want to get funding to go all over New England. That costs $12,000 a year for the telephone hook-up," he said. "Hopefully we will be able to get some money from one of the state organizations like the National Science Foundation or even perhaps the Board of Regents again."

The system began working last September after getting funding from the Board of Regents. "One of the problems of getting the system up and running is that while most schools have computers, very few are connected to outside systems by telephone modems. We have to educate the local schools to acquire modems, which cost between $100 and $300," he said.

The system, which is based in Furcolo Hall, has 100 users out of some 700 eligible institutions. "We have even had one user sign on from New Hampshire," Sieks said.

Some of the services offered by Mathnet include calendar listings of state, regional, and national mathematics events.

October declared AIDS awareness month

Acting Governor of Massachusetts Evelyn F. Murphy has proclaimed October AIDS Awareness Month in an effort to promote education and prevention of the deadly virus.

Data collected by the Department of Public Health shows, although the virus does not discriminate, minorities and women are disproportionately affected by the disease.

In Massachusetts, minorities comprise eight percent of the population, yet they represent 30 percent of the reported AIDS cases and black and Hispanic women represent more than half of the cases reported among women.

The information also indicated that 28 of the 34 reported children's cases of the disease have been black or Hispanic.

Women's issues to be debated

By TINA SCIOLETTI
Collegian Correspondent

The presidential candidates are neglecting issues of interest to women as they campaign for the November election, according to an associate vice chancellor at the University of Massachusetts.

"They have essentially been missing the boat," said Zaida Giraldo, associate vice chancellor for affirmative action and equal opportunity.

Giraldo, who is also the president of the American Association of University Women, has played a large role in the organization of a two-hour debate entitled "Women's Issues in the November Election."

The debate will be held tonight at the Amherst Junior High School auditorium, and is designed to clarify general differences between the two major political parties, Giraldo said.

Vivian Li, who serves as Democratic candidate Gov. Michael Dukakis' advisor on women's issues, will present the Democratic party position, and Joyce Hampers, former Commissioner of the State Department of Revenue, will offer the Republican position, Giraldo said.

Issues scheduled for discussion include child care, care for the elderly, family and medical leave, education, pay equity, welfare reform and the feminization of poverty, according to a press release from the UMass Office of Public Information.

Both Hampers and Li will make a 10-minute opening statement and then field questions from a three-woman panel. "The debate has been set up to be pretty exciting, with a capable panel chosen to ask good, hard questions," Giraldo said.

The members of the panel include Florence Frank, founding member of the Governor's Commission on the Status of Women; Patricia Sykes, assistant professor of political science at UMass and Polly Logan, executive director of the Republican Club of Massachusetts, according to the press release.

Surviving the dating game

For centuries, people have tried to master the dating ritual. People have tried everything from using scientific data to just plain winging it. The only problem is that as of late, this masterpiece is rarely performed. Especially at UMass.

Here we live, in a city of concrete cubby holes and grade F food. It is just the type of living arrangement that can bring a lot of togetherness. The only problem is that we never truly feel comfortable in letting people know whether we are interested in them or not. When the time comes to finally make a move, it is to say the least ambiguous, but somehow, we manage to meet and ultimately become couples. Yet nobody wants to make the first move.

Nancy Cohen

If you do have the courage to actually be honest, admit interest and ask a woman on a date, let me commend you right here and now. You have taken your first step to true masculinity. Now you're probably thinking; 'What do I do next?' I'm glad you asked. Sit back and relax guys, here's your guide to the do's and don'ts of dating.

Everything truly depends on what kind of woman you have asked out. Ask yourself the following questions:

1)Is she a schlockhead? Meaning, does she use so much hair spray that the enviornmentalists on campus are after her for ruining the ozone layer? And if you dare try to run your fingers through her hair, you better really like her because you are going to be stuck to her for a few days.

If the answer is yes, it will be a great idea to take her to a crowded fraternity party. That's the only place that her hair could possibly melt down to fumes, sweat, and beer. If this is achieved, you will get to see what she's really like under her Aqua Net shell.

2)Does she have expensive taste? Meaning she's used to champagne and caviar and has no inkling of a clue as to what the term 'starving college student' is. If so then by all means, take her to someplace like McDonalds or D'Angelos. This will allow you to prove to yourself what she's really made of. It takes a brave woman to get all dressed up only to be taken to a bargain Tuesday movie and D'Angelos. If she can go on with the evening, you know you've got a woman with true integrity.

3)Is she the intellectual type? Does she sit around most Saturday nights reading poetry and trying to get the true gist of the Love Boat? If this is true, then coffee at Trenduccis — oh, I mean Bonduccis — is the place for you. Here you can analyze Walt Whitman and Emily Dickinson and try to get at the 'true' deep, philosophical meaning about what they're trying to say.

4)Is she a staunch feminist? The best place to take her is a rally. It doesn't matter what kind. It only matters that you prove your honest and open to the needs and inherent superiority of woman. They love this kind of B.S.

5)Is she a macho woman? Take her to a metal-head concert where she can slam dance with style. Who knows, she might get injured. Then you can prove your studliness and pseudo-sensitivity by bashing someone's head in for her. After she bails you out of jail, she'll probably be your love puppet forever. She might even give you her chains to wear around your neck. If you accept them, I wouldn't cheat on her, unless you have comprehensive life insurance.

Keep in mind guys that even if the date was not the whirlwind romance of the century, you still have accomplished more than half the population at UMass. If nothing else comes of it, at least you've had yourself one little adventure.

Right guys? You do have faith in me don't you? Guys? Hello?

Odds and ends

All I want is some QUIET!!!

A sudden "thud" awakens me from my brief period of sleep. My eyes immediately open.

"What was that?" I mumble as I roll over and bury my head in the pillow.

Thud. . . thud, thud.

"What the hell?" I grumble.

Thud. . . thud, thud (getting louder).

I look over at the clock. Two-twelve, and I have a History exam at 8 am.

Thud. . .thud, thud.

"Damn it!" I hear my roommate shout.

Merideth O'Brien

I angrily turn over to see my roommate (all of 4'10') grab a book and climb up on her desk. She holds the book fiercely, waiting for them to do it again.

Thud. . . thud, thud.

"That's it!" she says. She smacks the book against the ceiling. Tiny pieces of plaster fall all over her bed and her desk.

We wait. Silence!

Perhaps now I can sleep. After studying until two, I need it. As I get comfortable again (and hear my roommate brush the plaster off of her bed) I relax.

At exactly two twenty-eight (I remember exactly because I looked at the clock) I am jolted awake by the vibrations of everything in the room. All I hear is a blasting stereo. For the floor to actually vibrate, the music (and I use the term loosely) has to be pretty damn loud.

I sit up and see my roommate clenching her fists; she has an 8:00 too. My annoyance grows as I sit there losing precious sleep with every pound of the music.

"Your turn," she says.

I viciously throw my covers aside and get out of bed. I start jumping up and down on the bare floor. My roommate starts laughing. I stop for a minute - listen for the music.

Silence.

"Finally!" I yell as I climb back into bed and bury myself in blankets.

Just as I lay my head on the pillow, the music - rather "noise" resumes, but this time there is a simultaneous chorus of shouts and laughter coming from the room next door.

"Why me?" I whine. I turn to my roommate, "Whatever happened to 'quiet hours'? Did we make this much noise last year, or are we just getting old?"

Not saying a word, she climbs out of bed. She pulls on some sweats and a pair of socks. As she heads for the door I ask, "Where are you going? Don't you have an 8:00 tomorrow morning?"

"I'll skip it. I don't want to miss out on all of the fun!"

Wanted: UMass students for Washington battle

There is something fundamentally wrong with the way tax money is allocated in this country. While hundreds of billions are spent on the military, education gets a meager $17 billion from the federal government. While paying lipservice to the importance of education, both presidential candidates have yet to explain to us why they think of themselves as future "education presidents." So far, Dukakis and Bush have shown only one thing: that they agree with the elitist premises of the higher education system, but are willing to help finance the huge debts that students incur in order to go to school.

The average tuition for four years of private college cost $26,264 in 1980, but has risen to $50,000 today. Public college costs have risen 25 percent. Yet federal financial aid has declined 16 percent. The gap between tuition and financial help is growing every year. With a family income that is sliding steadily, things will get much worse in the coming years.

The situation is even worse for students of color. Black students, for instance, are more affected by cuts in financial aid. When the family income of 50 percent of black students is below $12,000, it could hardly be any different. Added to the financial constraints, students of color have to deal with a curriculum and institutions that are culturally biased.

On October 14-15, students will be showing their opposition to the policies of the Department of Education in Washington, D.C. Let's send a clear message to the folks in D.C. If you wish to join us, call the Graduate Student Senate Office.

As I turned onto D4, a foul odor alighted my nostrils. It was the unmistakable stench of human excretion. Hesitantly I stepped forward, noticing a group of patients — barely recognizable as human. Sympathetic to my distress, my supervisor walked ahead of me, greeting patients with a smile and cheerful hello. I followed her lead, trying my best to smile even as I wanted to cry.

Many were slumped in their wheelchair, twitching involuntarily or shaking nervously, unable to hold their heads up to return our greeting. Others stared hollowly through us as if we didn't exist. The hopeless blank faces sent eerie chills up and down my spine.

Scott Green

From somewhere within the hospital's walls came a nauseating scream that made my stomach ache. The noises, the sights, the smell that permeated each ward almost overwhelmed my senses.

"What am I doing here?" I thought. Then I saw a man sitting quietly apart from the others. He seemed mellow, calm. I said "hello" to him. "Hello yourself! Nigger! Bastard!" I waited until I got around the corner before I broke out in laughter. That is just what I needed, some comic relief. Whew.

In every corridor of every building, the patients are lined up like cattle waiting to be slaughtered by the butcher's knife. The only difference is that their butcher is the Eternal One, and He never calls for them too soon. I have talked with more than 50 patients, and most of them would rather be dead than live in this place. Unwanted and abandoned by their families, unable to care for themselves, and mentally and physically frail, they rock back and forth in their rocking chairs day in and day out, waiting patiently, hoping that their number is called next.

This is everyday life for most people living in a chronic care hospital. And I do stress "people" because often it is easy to forget that they are human beings with feelings who need to feel loved and reassured, just like everyone else. It is sad to learn that these people are only thought of as burdens — burdens to their family, to society, and to themselves. This hospital is the last stop these unfortunate souls will make before their destination unknown.

By the end of my first day, I seriously questioned whether I would be able to break through the mental prisons in which these people live and make a difference in their lives, not only as a therapist, but as a friend.

ARTS/LIVING

Truth keeps artists working

By REBECCA MORRISSEY
Collegian Correspondent

Twelve student artists are transforming the Student Union Gallery into a labyrinth for a new exhibit entitled Tell Me The Truth, which they will continue to work on while the show is in progress.

The finished product will contain ten stations for the viewer to stop at while listening to one of five possible audio tapes, each representing a different point of view on art.

The idea behind such a unique show is, "to go beyond the traditional definition of a gallery," explained artist Paula Hodecker. "The labyrinth is a way of directing the viewer."

Artist Fran Trainor sees the labyrinth as being "in a sense a metaphor for the complex vision that people take towards seeing art. These views are developed from each individual's family, education, social class, etc . . ."

The tapes are intended to back up that idea by attempting to show the viewer that the way one interprets art and life come not only from the individual, but also from the person's environment, upbringing, and mood at a given moment, among other things. The tapes will help the viewer to understand how the outside influences work.

One point of the exhibit is "to show the way art is presented; how information is relayed and taken in by the viewer," said Hodecker.

"The exhibit," Trainor explained, "is a chance for students and the community at large to have a look at the exposed mechanism behind the actual piece of art, as well as show them that there is more than one way of seeing art."

Tell Me Truth will be at the Student Union Art Gallery until Oct. 21st. There will be a talk given on Oct. 13, and a reception on Oct. 17. Gallery hours are Monday through Friday 11 a.m. to 4p.m.

Union Program Council brings bands to UMass

By PETER LEON
Collegian Staff

Barbara Streisand sings it well: "The art of making art is putting it together . . . "

But it is UPC that does the real work of putting it together, and they do do it well.

The Union Program Council is a student run campus concert production company. With student monies, they book shows in the Fine Arts Center, Student Union Ballroom, and the Blue Wall Café.

UPC has a core staff of about 12 people who are responsible for overseeing everything from the soliciting of talent, to setting up and breaking down the stages the day of the show. There is also a General Committee.

The General Committee, which meets Tuesdays at 6:30 p.m., has approximately 100 members and provides the work the core staff oversees. General Committee members are the security for the shows, the hospitality for the band members, and the stage crew hands as well as publicity for the shows.

Bud Verge, UPC's business manager, has the responsibility of arranging "for budget and payment of the bands, sound, lights, police, and the EMT." His work mostly leaves him behind the scenes, but the work he does promoting UPC and networking with other student groups is a vital part of keeping UPC running.

The operating budget which Verge oversees is $210,000 this year. $102,000 comes from the Student Activities Trust Fund, $30,000 from the Board of Governors, $13,000 Art Council block grant and the last $45,000 is raised through ticket sales.

Ari Weinstein is production manager and is in charge of ensuring shows themselves run well. This includes the hospitality, stage crew, and security forces which are headed by Margo Griffin, Steve Shepard, Steve Krendall and Stacy Weinberg respectively. He also deals directly with the band managers when any problems arise.

Talent coordinator is the position where it all begins. Traci Swartz as talent coordinator "networks in the 'real' world, talking to talent agents to book bands." It may sound glamorous but she has to "find out who is available, coordinate with dates UPC can handle, negotiate contracts, and if the contracts are accepted making sure the bands get paid and all the contracts are honored." Though she has the last word on the decision to book a band Swartz says she likes to get a consensus.

So far this year, UPC has booked the Godfathers and Living Colour. Next show is this Friday when Camper Van Beethoven play the S.U.B. The Smithereens will play the Fine Arts Center on Oct. 25.

Chaloner, a Professor of Botany at UMass, will lecture on the topic of "The Latest 50 Million Years—Evolution of the Plant Kingdom."

Chaloner is a corresponding member of the Botanical Society of America, an honor limited to 50 living foreign botanists in the world. He is also a Hildred Carlisle Professor of Botany and Head of the School of Life Sciences at Royal Holloway and Bedford New College at the University of London. He is the author of over 120 scientific papers and is considered the premier paleobotanist in the world today.

Raven, home secretary of the National Academy of Sciences and Engelmann Professor of Botany at Washington University, will discuss "The Next Twenty Years — Global Destruction of Biological Diversity: Can It Be Stopped?"

"Peter Raven is without a doubt an individual who possesses a combination of mental ability and drive far in excess of that present in all but a handful of human beings," said James Walker, head of the UMass Botany Department.

Raven wrote his first research paper at the age of 14 and in 38 years has written over 350 scientific papers. He is considered the world's premier botanist and is the foremost authority for the preservation of the world's tropical rain forests, said Walker.

"He is unquestionably one of the most influential scientists in the United States," said Walker.

Raven is currently on a committee that works with Congress to recommend priorities for science spending and is the Director of the Missouri Botanical Garden.

"Peter Raven joins a distinguished list of visitors and scholars who will be on our campus this year," said Duffey.

The convocation is free and is open to the public.

UMass singles winners were Gable, 6-3, 6-0; Desormiers, 6-3, 6-2; and Audet, 6-3, 6-2. Soto lost a tough match after grabbing the lead and losing two tie breakers, 3-6, 7-6, 7-5. Other losers were Stone, 6-2, 6-4; and Johnson, 6-3, 6-4.

In their away match, the Minutemen traveled to Burlington Sunday morning to take on the University of Vermont. It was the first indoor dual match of the season and the team didn't fair well, losing 5-4. Roberts attributed the loss to a team let-down after the big victory Friday.

Gable (6-1, 6-2) and Soto (2-6, 6-4, 7-5) were the only singles winners, leaving the team trailing 4-2 going into the doubles. Audet was serving for a victory in his match but dropped the second set tiebreaker and was defeated in three sets, 2-6, 7-6, 6-2. Stone also lost a grueling match, being taken to three sets for the third time in a week, 6-3, 6-7, 6-2. Desormiers (6-4, 6-2) and Johnson (6-3, 6-3) also lost.

The doubles teams just missed the sweep they needed to pull out the team's victory. Gable and Desormiers won, 7-5, 6-4, and Soto and Johnson were victorious, 6-3, 6-2, but Stone and Johnson lost, 6-4, 7-5.

The team is now 4-2 on the season, with its next scheduled match Friday against Clark University of New York on the Upper Boyden Courts.

top of the penalty box, she let one fly that sailed unhindered into the left side of the net at 47:35.

Powers had the option of taking the shot herself or passing off to a streaking Beth Roundtree, which allowed her to bang home the goal so easily.

"I think everyone in the ballpark though' that Michelle would knock that one o' to Beth Roundtree," said Rudy. "The goalkeeper never got a dive off. Everyone was frozen."

With the scoring done, Rudy was able to shuttle in the bench for the late part of the game. Curtis replaced DeSantis in net with about 31 minutes left, and slowly but surely, everyone else got into the game.

Not only was it helpful to get his substitutes some playing time, but Rudy had some more long-range ideas in his thinking.

"We had a chance to get everyone in, and we came through and got the win," Rudy said. "We stayed relatively healthy for North Carolina and N.C. State."

Sidelines: The Minutewomen retained their third place ranking from last week, but they have a little company this time around. Colorado College, which was at No. 4 last week, moved into a tie with UMass, each having 260 points.

Water polo takes two of three

By DENNIS MADSEN
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts water polo team improved its record to 6-7 this past weekend with a pair of wins over tough Eastern rivals.

The Minutemen made the trip to Boston, where they first went up against Harvard on Friday night, and then followed up with a pair of games Saturday at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

In the first game against Harvard, UMass came in at a disadvantage. The team had been stuck in traffic all evening and it took a while to get geared up. The effects of the late arrival showed as UMass came out flat and trailed at the half, 5-1.

"The bright spot was that we outplayed them in the second half, but it took us so long to get going," said coach Russ Yarworth. In the end, the Minutemen couldn't recover and dropped a big disappointer, 9-4.

The next day, however, was an entirely different story. They started a little flat against Amherst College, but got it going in time. High scorer was sophomore Jon Miller with five goals, while freshman goalie Todd Larson played well, saving 70 percent of the shots against him in a winning 11-6 effort.

The Minutemen were really cranked when they did battle with Williams College later in the day. UMass crushed its opponent, 17-0, with Carl Johnson, another freshman goaltender, getting a rare shutout. Roger Kennedy led the bombardment with five goals regular in the heart of the backfield.

Lawrence also happens to play big brother to UMass freshman fullback Dan Lawrence.

The Minutemen, meanwhile, have seen their season's record drop to 7-5 with their most recent loss. Aside from the pride and prestige that would result from a victory this afternoon, UMass is seeking a restoration of confidence as well. The Minutemen have come up short several times this season in pressurized games, and now that the post-season crusade is over, there remains for this team a lingering desire to prove its worth against a tough opponent.

"We're a different team for a big game," said McCormick of the Minutemen, who have posted a 1-4 record on the road. "The key for us is getting our confidence back against a good team, and I think UConn may be that team."

"We made a commitment at the beginning of the season," continued McCormick, "I don't think it makes any sense to let down now."

Minutewomen dispose of Holy Cross, 3-1

By RONN GARRY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts volleyball team wasted very little time (1 hour and five minutes) in disposing of the Lady Crusaders of Holy Cross College 15-3, 12-15, 15-12, 15-1 last night at Totman Gymnasium.

Although Holy Cross didn't play an extremely poor game, they were little match for a UMass team that had just come off a rugged Atlantic 10 road trip this weekend. If it weren't for a mental lack of intensity in the second game, the game would have been over as quickly as it started.

"It's a nuisance, but we shouldn't have lost that second game," UMass coach Carol Ford said.

Very few volleys lasted more than three hits and the game took on a very fast pace.

The Minutewomen had already dominated HC in the first set -- in the end, the lead 12-1 before winning three of the next five points and taking the game 15-3.

The strongest point of the Holy Cross team was its blocking and, although they made UMass work a little harder on the kills, their defense just wasn't their.

UMass senior outside hitter, Juliet Primer, pounded the Cross time-after-time up the center of the defense. She had four kills in the first game.

"I'm happy with the way Juliet Primer played. It was the most she has ever blocked, and it was the most she has ever killed," Ford said.

It seemed too easy after that first game, and UMass lost its intensity in the second game. An unusually small (45-50 people) and quiet Totman-crowd didn't provide the adrenalin for the Minutewomen.

"I warned them. It's typical, whenever you beat [another team] easily, there's no place to go but up [for them]. It shouldn't happen. We shouldn't have lost that second game," Ford said. With the score tied at seven, Holy Cross snuck past UMass and captured the next five points. The Minutewomen tried to rally, they even got within one, 12-13, after a Barbara Meehan kill. But the Crusaders hung on, saving face with a 15-12 second game victory.

Primer again had four kills, senior outside hitter Julie Smith had three, and junior setter Karen Ferguson had two.

"Karen said the right things in that second game. She didn't want to lose that game," Ford said.

Holy Cross lead by three early in the third game before UMass gathered its breath and took a commanding lead at 8-5. The Minutewomen increased the lead to 13-8 but couldn't knock out HC. The Crusaders were contesting every point at the end of the third, and they almost forced UMass into a deep hole.

But a Holy Cross service error after a UMass time out proved costly. At 14-12, Primer made HC pay for its error. She nailed a kill down the middle to seal the third game.

Ferguson didn't allow the Minutewomen a slow start in the fourth game. With a combination of running, jumping, kill serves and standing accuracy, she served UMass to a 6-0 lead and the Minutewomen began to cruise.

Ford substituted three freshmen -- Susan DiClemente, Kelly Ramsey, and Rebecca Plimpton, into the game and the kill-parade continued. Holy Cross could only manage one point in the final frame.

"I was happy everyone got to play. The substitutes played well," Ford said.

"That last game was the way it should have been. But Holy Cross has a couple of really good players," Ford said.

The 10-2 Minutewomen must now prepare for this weekend's upcoming Atlantic 10 matches against West Virginia and Duquesne Universities.

"We haven't beaten a good conference team yet," Ford said.

Although the Minutewomen have beaten St. Bonaventure University [0-4 in the conference], they have lost two other matches to the better A-10 teams.

Now the Minutewomen will be hosting two of the top conference teams.

"(UMass) should be able to adjust and realize that Penn State [last week's opponent and top-ranked A-10 team] and West Virginia will block their best hits and dig their best hits. That's where the experience should come in this year," Ford said.

UMass football hits the top 10 in poll

The University of Massachusetts football team's victory over the University of Rhode Island may not have been its biggest win, but it was big enough for the Minutemen to crack the top 10 in this week's NCAA Division 1-AA poll.

UMass, 4-1, moved up to No. 9 in this week's poll, after being tied for 11th last week. Furman, which was tied with the Minutemen, lost over the weekend and fell to 20th.

The top six is essentially the same as last week. North Texas is No. 1, followed by Western Illinois, Appalachian State and Marshall University.

Nevada-Reno remains at fifth and is tied with Lafayette College, which was sixth last week. Idaho is No. 7 and Georgia Southern is No. 8. [See related box on page 11]

Among Yankee Conference teams, Villanova used a victory over the University of Connecticut to assume the No. 15 spot, knocking the Huskies from the top 20.

Delaware, which UMass will play on the road in 10 days, replaced the University of New Hampshire in the No. 19 position.

Minutewomen shut the door on Dartmouth 2-0

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

Yesterday, the Big Green ran into the "Bigger Red."

The Dartmouth College women's soccer team came to Boyden Field ready for an upset, maybe hoping to catch the University of Massachusetts in a period of letdown. But UMass rose to the occasion, and turned back its opponent for a 2-0 win.

The win came just three days after the Minutewomen, 8-0-1 and ranked third in the nation, had battled to a scoreless tie against New England rival Connecticut. And with a HUGE weekend series coming up against North Carolina and North Carolina State, Dartmouth could only hope to find the Minutewomen in a lull.

But there would be none of that. Despite a slow start which saw Dartmouth put a lot of pressure in the UMass zone early, the Reds shrugged off any negative thoughts to totally take control by game's end.

Part of the reason for the sluggish start was the game conditions. Although it was a home game, UMass hasn't had many of those yet this year, so the team is still not very familiar with all of the quirks that Boyden has to offer. And though it was sunny and the field was dry, it had an affect on UMass, which had just come off of trudging through a quagmire against UConn.

"Keep in mind that we haven't played here much," said UMass coach Jim Rudy. "We were a little hard with our receiving, and we were off rhythm. The big difference was going from the wet, slick stuff to here."

Once the Minutewomen got acclimated, it was over. A pair of goals seven minutes apart over the two halves were all the offense that would be needed, as goalkeeper Carla DeSantis, with relief help from backup Mary Curtis, posted the eighth shutout in 10 tries.

Junior back Sarah Sztetela got the only goal that UMass would need, the first of her career. Sophomore midfielder April Kater got the assist, although Aeolus, the Greek god of the wind, could have gotten one as well.

Sztetela took a pass from Kater and broke down the left side. She lifted a shot that headed toward the box, and Dartmouth goalkeeper Kari Reuter went up to make the grab. But the wind held it in the air and it eluded Reuter, slipping just inside the right goalpost. A tough sun and some confusion in the goal mouth could have also contributed.

The goal came with just 4:27 left in the half, and provided the Minutewomen with a boost that they were able to carry into the second half.

"My halftime message was to be patient," Rudy said. "In the first half, we were knocking down some smart balls in the back, but we couldn't hold onto them in the front half."

UMass began to control the ball a lot easier in the midfield in the second half, and wasted little time in getting the insurance goal.

Michelle Powers stole a ball about halfway into the Dartmouth zone and walked straight in. When she reached the

Men's tennis splits 2 matches

By JIM CUMMINGS

For the first time in University of Massachusetts men's tennis history, the team pulled off a sweep of its three Connecticut rivals.

Friday's 6-3 home court victory over the University of Hartford completed the sweep following wins over Central Connecticut State University and the University of Connecticut earlier in the week.

On Friday, UMass split the six singles matches against Hartford, which put the team in a position to have to take two of three doubles matches for the win. UMass had not beaten Hartford in five years, but this time, the doubles teams were too tough.

The number one team of Brian Gable and Joe Desormiers won in straight sets, 6-4, 6-0, as did the tandem Chris Johnson and Humberto Soto, 6-1, 6-3. The team victory was already in hand when Rich Stone and Paul Audet came back and won their match, 4-6, 7-6, 7-6.

Men's soccer eager to face Huskies

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

With all hopes of an invitation to post-season play lost in Sunday's 2-0 defeat at Rhode Island, why should the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team get excited about today's matchup with the mighty Huskies of the University of Connecticut (3 pm on Upper Boyden Field)?

"If we beat UConn," said UMass captian Mike McCormick, "the season will end up successful, whether or not we make post-season play."

Or take it from head coach Jeff Gettler, who describes today's game as much more than just a chance to topple the No. 2 ranked team in New England (according to the latest Intercollegiate Soccer Association of America poll) from the top of the list.

"Every year UConn is one of the better teams in New England," said Gettler. "The UConn game is always a test for us to see how good a team we are. . . what kind of program we have in comparison to them."

For a long time indeed, under the tutelage of legendary coach (and UMass class of '58 graduate) Joe Marrone, UConn has been a bully in the New England collegiate soccer scene. Marrone has accumulated a top-heavy 269-116-33 record in his 20 years as head Husky; UConn has been to the NCAA's in 14 of the last 19 seasons.

The rivalry between UMass and UConn dates back to the days of the Great Depression, as the two schools have squared off 55 times since the first meeting in 1929. UConn holds a 28-22-6 advantage over the years; most recently, the Huskies have won 12 of the last 14 reincarnations of the rivalry.

The current edition of the UConn soccer dynasty cracked the top ten rankings earlier this season after shocking Harvard 2-1 in Cambridge. The Crimson were the top ranked team in New England at the time, and were the No. 1 team in the nation prior to the loss according to Soccer America magazine. The Huskies have since won six of their last seven en route to their current 8-5-1 record (the lone loss suffered last week at Yale University, now the top ranked team in the region).

All-American Dan Donigan anchors a relatively even offensive attack for the Huskies; sophomore Brian Parker leads the team with six goals and three assists on the season, and freshman Rob Lindell totes similar credentials. Marrone alternates juniors Tom Foley and Brian Hall in goal, while Junior Sweeper Bill Lawrence is a

Townehouse fire strands four

Four residents of Amherst's Townehouse Apartments have been forced from their homes after a Tuesday night fire, caused by an unattended candle, damaged a second-floor bedroom, leaving the dwelling uninhabitable.

The four University of Massachusetts students living at apartment number 57 received no injuries as a result of the fire, according to the Amherst Fire Department.

The blaze, which began at approximately 11 p.m., forced the students to find other housing for at least two weeks, said Judi Johnson, the property manager.

She said no estimate on the cost of the damage was available yet.

When firefighters entered the room, they worked with axes and other tools to remove the window frame, so they could toss a smoldering mattress from the blaze. The candle was left on the mattress, the fire department reported.

Asst. Fire Chief Paul LaLonde said, "It's a darn good thing it didn't make it past the Sheetrock [wall board]. Otherwise the whole roof to the apartment would have burnt." The wall board is installed in apartments to prevent fires from spreading, said LaLonde. The fire was contained to the one room, according to the fire department.

The battle with the fire lasted about one-and-a-half hours the fire department reported.

Firefighters made a routine check of the attic above apartment number 57 to make sure flames did not come through the fire wall between the apartments.

Town cops to bust partiers

By THOMAS RODRIGUES
Collegian Staff

Amherst Police will be out in full force this weekend and every weekend following until complaints about alcohol related incidents drop in number.

Following last week's arrest of fifty-two persons for various alcohol violations, Amherst Police Chief Don Maia promised to stem the flow of illegal alcohol sales and distribution in the town by increasing the pressure on violators.

"I'm expecting compliance with the alcohol laws. We are increasing our manpower to have all available personnel working," Maia said.

He said he was "sick" of the continued disrespect for the law and of the 60-plus complaints he receives each weekend from townspeople, students, and "people who want a decent night's sleep."

"These people want to see an end to the drunken behavior, the urinating on lawns and bushes, the public misconduct, the noise and loss of sleep," Maia said.

"Many people feel they can sell and dispense alcohol wherever they want. They can't. It's against the law," Maia said.

Every squad car the Amherst Police own will be patrolling the town area this weekend, he said, and the various apartment complexes such as Townehouse, Brandywine, and Brittany Manor.

Maia said apartment residents are not allowed to buy kegs for a party and then charge the guests for the alcohol, nor can they use the excuse of charging admission for the music they supply if alcohol is involved because that too is illegal.

The police chief also said it was "very possible" undercover officers would attend and then disperse parties they found to be violating alcohol regulations.

Students contacted for reaction to the crackdown refused to give their names for fear of being traced this weekend but said they will take greater care when having parties and would try to let in only people they knew.

"It's gonna make it a little harder to party. But hey, you gotta do what you gotta do," said one Townehouse resident.

Another Townehouse resident remarked, "I hate to see what is going to happen around here on Halloween."

UMass may get its own chapter of the ACLU

By KELLY CAVANAUGH
Collegian Correspondent

The possibility exists that by the end of this semester, the University of Massachusetts may have its own chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union.

"UMass is a ripe campus for an ACLU chapter," said Alden Miller, campus coordinator for the project.

"We should have something solid by the end of the semester, because there are a number of people interested right now."

The ACLU, which has been operating nationally since 1920, started in response to labor problems that plagued the post World War I United States.

Founded by Roger Baldwin, the primary aim of the ACLU has been to maintain civil rights guaranteed by the Constitution, and to serve those working in the labor field.

"Basically, the next step would be a slide show, guest speakers, or a table in the Campus Center Concourse," said Miller.

What the group would be working on has yet to be decided by those who are involved.

One idea, according to Miller, might to be to get involved with the campus administration, as does the Boston University chapter of the ACLU. Or, he says, they could take on a specific project or piece of legislation.

Miller's interest in the ACLU stemmed from a legal studies class, taught by Professor Peter D'Errico.

A University Without Walls student, Miller saw this group as an extension to his work in human services/legal advocacy.

"The ACLU was looking for people who were interested in legal studies, and Prof. D'Errico recommended me, " said Miller.

Miller followed up on the group, and found that it is behind a lot of positive things, and that the phrase "card-carrying member" is just a cliche.

"The group is really a practical safeguard of the Constitution, and has had a healthy influence on American society," he said.

Although most Americans are trying to preserve the Constitution, Miller said he can see how the concept of adherence seems like a radical concept.

"It's not an un-American activity whatsoever," Miller said. Nationally, the ACLU has a strong legislative program, which sponsors and supports legislation for the protection of civil liberties.

Senate elections, referendum results released

The police sub-station in Washington Residence Hall was soundly denounced in a referendum question in Tuesday's Student Government Association senatorial elections.

The question asked: "Should the police sub-station in Washington Tower be removed." There were 1,011 yes votes and 382 no votes.

Brendan Case is co-chairman of the SGA Governmental Affairs Committee, which administered the election. He said some people might have rushed through the question, saw the words 'sub-station" and immediately checked "no."

Bush and Dukakis prep for debate

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Once again there's talk of high stakes as Michael Dukakis and George Bush get ready for their second and last debate of the 1988 presidential campaign.

Campaign Analysis

Maybe this will be the breakthrough debate, the occasion when one or the other will so impress voters with his eloquence or ineptitude that the election will be decided then and there.

More likely it will be an October rerun of their September debate.

A few new lines have appeared in the campaign weeks following that debate.

Look for Dukakis to hold up a $20 bill and deride Bush's proposal for a $1,000-a-year tax deferred savings account Thursday night.

"Twenty bucks," he tells roaring partisan audiences. "Twenty bucks." That, he says, is the annual tax savings Americans would realize from the Bush plan.

Crime has been a major stump theme for Bush in recent days, with renewed attacks on the Massachusetts prison furlough program.

What might voters remember of their first confrontation, the debate that Dukakis likes to refer to as "some of the best 90 minutes of this whole campaign"

They might recall Bush's stirring defense of his running mate, Indiana Sen. Dan Quayle.

"He took a tremendous pounding," said the vice president "and everybody now knows that he took a very unfair pounding."

AP photo

George Bush

AP photo

Michael Dukakis

Bush said Quayle would do very, very well. And he has my full confidence and he'll have the confidence of people in their 30's and 40's."

The Republican nominee predicted his running mate would do "very well when we get into the debates."

Quayle has since had his debate with Democratic vice presidential nominee Lloyd Bentsen. The Indiana senator came across as overly programmed and the polls showed that he fell short of Bush's expectations.

Will Bush rise to the defense of Quayle again? That should be one moment to watch for on Thursday night.

That first presidential debate also was the night that Dukakis gave a passionless response to a question about his lack of passion, about the characterization that he is "the smartest clerk in the world."

"I care deeply about people," said Dukakis. He said it again and again.

"I am somebody who believes deeply ... I care very deeply... These are things I believe in very, very deeply."

He conceded that "I may be a little calmer that some about it."

Dukakis did show a passion for certain words. He used "lead," "leader," and "leadership" 18 times during the debate.

NATO security undermined, says Norway's defense chief

KONGSBERG, Norway (AP) — Norway's defense chief and one of its top computer engineers testified that the sale of Norwegian technology to the Soviet Union undermined NATO security.

Gen. Vigleik Eide said yesterday that the Kongsberg Vaspenfabrik, in a joint venture with Toshiba Machines Co. of Japan, exported computerized control systems for milling machinery that allowed the Soviets to speed up their production of silent submarine propellers.

The general said the state-of-the-art technology would make it more difficult to detect the vessels.

He made the statements at the trial of Bernard John Green, a Briton who was the sales manager at Kongsberg and who signed the contracts that violated Western export regulations to Eastern bloc countries.

Green, who has lived in Norway since 1975, pleaded innocent to charges of lying on the export license application for the sale. He argued that the sale, completed between 1983 and 1985, was a collective decision by the company. Green, 50, faces a maximum two-and-a-half year prison term if convicted.

Eide said the technology enabled the Soviets "to more quickly equip old and new submarines with such propellers. From 1984 to 1987 the Soviets produced 50 propellers with low noise level.

"This weakened our possibilities of detecting subs and reduced our capability of drawing the right military conclusions in times of crisis. Norway's security was damaged," Eide said.

Norway is a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and of the Paris-based Coordination Committee for Multinational Export Control (COCOM), which regulates trade with the Soviet bloc.

The Norwegian-Japanese joint venture involved the export the milling machinery with nine axes, which violated COCOM regulations that only allowed export of two-axe machine tools.

3.5 billion years covered in one hour and a half

By THOMAS RODRIGUES
Collegian Staff

About 600 people turned out to hear 3.5 billion years of evolutionary history spoken in one-and-a-half hours by three eminent professors of botany in the Campus Center Auditorium yesterday.

The convocation featured renowned evolutionary biologists, Lynn Margulis, William Chaloner and Peter Raven, each delivering speeches the content of which spanned the time that life has been on Earth.

Chancellor Joseph Duffey, who presided over the event, remarked that the record for the most information transmitted in one hour would be broken, speaking of the billions of years of history to be covered.

Lynn Margulis, who recently became a professor at the University of Massachusetts, began by praising the people who made the new Botany laboratory which opened yesterday possible.

The lesson in evolutionary history began with Margulis, distinguished botanist and member of the National Academy of Sciences, delivering a slide show on the first three billion years of life.

Quickly moving to the main topic she wanted to discuss, Margulis showed her audience visually and verbally how bacteria has played a dominant role in life on the planet.

"Bacteria dominated the surface of the Earth, and it was not primitive or single-celled life as many people think. Bacteria has done much that we don't give it credit for," Margulis said.

Margulis made a case for bacteria to become a kingdom of its own and passed the microphone to colleague and premier paleobotanist William Chaloner.

Chaloner, also a professor of Botany at the University, took the second leg of the journey through history by compressing 500 million years in to a 12 month diagram.

He went on to illustrate the evolution of plants from sea to land and their relative timescale position with man's evolution.

"On the first day of December (at the top of Chaloner's calendar) plants began to grow on land. They were slim pencil-like stalks, and in a few short days on our calendar plants achieved some remarkable things," Chaloner said.

According to Chaloner by the third of December plants had leaves, by the fifth developed into trees and forests, a few days after that seeds for future plants came into being and by Christmas Eve there were flowers. Chaloner added that man showed up to reap the rewards of the plants, such as fruit, at about 9 p.m. on the last day of December.

Taking the lecture 20 years into the realm of future happenings, guest speaker and Home Secretary of the National Academy of Sciences, Peter Raven painted a desolate picture of poverty, overpopulation, and the world hunger associated with the global destruction of biological diversity.

Following his speech and a musical interlude directed by Professor of Saxophone, Lynn Klock, Raven received an honorary Doctorate of Sciences degree presented him by University President David C. Knapp.

Student senate ratifies election, allocates concert, copier funds

By GEORGE FRANCY
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Student Senate last night ratified the results of Tuesday's election with no opposition. (Results on pages 6 and 7).

The senate also approved the allocation of money for two concerts and a copying machine.

In a move that was heavily debated, Southwest Area Government was given $2,750 for the copying machine. The proposal drew fire because SWAG bought the copying machine over the summer and was now trying to get reimbursement from the senate.

Treasurer Laura Filkins headed the effort to defeat the motion. She said the senate should not be granting student money for things that had already been purchased.

Filkins tried to amend the proposal so that a $1,500 loan and a $1,250 grant be given to SWAG which would put more of the financial burden on the area government. The amendment was defeated.

Supporters of the motion said it was a good idea because it would reduce money spent by SWAG for copying and would be available to many other groups besides the area government.

In the other fund allocation moves, Black Mass Communications Project was granted $1,500 for a concert and the African American Student Society was given $1,000, also for a concert.

In a move to resolve the issue of SGA presidents, Senators Bob Monaghan and Meredith Madison suspended the rules to call for another presidential election in November. This move was defeated.

"I think we've gone long enough without a president. The student body needs a president," Monaghan said in defense of his motion. The presidential question has been plaguing the senate since Shari Silkoff and Jason Rabinowitz were elected last March.

The two have not taken office because of an ambiguity between the SGA Constitution and its bylaws concerning whether two persons can hold the office of president. The matter has been referred to the Student Supreme Court for a decision.

The senate also elected four members to the Nominating Subcommittee of the Governmental Affairs Committee.

Eleven nominees were received for the subcommittee, and Traci Davis, Karen Flanagan, Todd Lever, and John Dunlap were elected. They, in turn, have to choose two other members to sit on the subcommittee.

The Nominating Subcommittee takes applications from all senators and places them on the various committees of the SGA.

Homecoming

Chairwoman of the Amherst Board of Selectmen Edith Wilkinson and President of the Amherst Chamber of Commerce Richard Howland will speak at an outdoor breakfast at the University on Saturday, October 15, kicking off a Homecoming celebration.

A parade, which is expected to be the largest in recent years, will loop through Amherst later that morning. The parade will be the most public of several events including, athletic competitions, reunions, concerts, and a banquet for retiring Dean of Students William Field.

Five hundred alumni and friends breakfasting on Haigus Mall at 10 a.m. Saturday will also hear Con Nugent, director of the Five Colleges consortium, University Chancellor Joseph Duffey and Vice Chancellor for University Relations and Development Deirdre Ling.

At 11:00 a.m., the Homecoming procession of floats and bands will form on Commonwealth Avenue. The parade will travel up North Pleasant Street through the center of town, turning right on Amity St. and returning to campus on Lincoln Avenue.

"The route is somewhat symbolic," says Associate Vice Chancellor James Langley. "The parade will pass the corner where the decision to locate a land-grant college at Amherst was made."

Former dean honored next week

Skinner featured in exhibit

By JOHN SWANSON
Collegian Staff

The achievements of the first Dean of the Home Economics department are finally being acknowledged in the exhibit entitled "Recognizing Relevance: Edna Skinner and Women's Work."

Skinner, who worked at the Massachusetts Agricultural College from 1919 until 1946 was also Advisor of Women. Penny Ralston, head of the University of Massachusetts Division of Home Economics said Skinner played a crucial role in developing the program into a division of the College of Food and Natural Resources.

"She really was the woman on campus from 1919 to 1946," Ralston said.

The exhibit, which is part of the University's 125th anniversary celebration, is on display in Mitchell Lounge, Skinner Hall through next week. The building is named for the late dean. The lounge is open from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. daily.

Skinner was born in Cooper, Michigan in 1880. She attended Michigan State Normal College and Columbia University Teacher's College. She taught home economics at Columbia University, James Millikin University and the University of California.

When Skinner came to Amherst, only a few women were enrolled in the school. When she left, the college had over 600 female students. She died in 1958.

Ralston said Skinner encouraged women to become involved in extracurricular activities. Skinner took an active part in the Collegian, the YWCA, the Roister-Doisters drama club and the equestrian team.

"She was really concerned about the whole student, the whole person," Ralston said.

Hitchhiking gets thumbs down

By SARA GALER
Collegian Staff

Hitchhiking is a reality in any college community and while many students acknowledge the risks, some find they have few alternatives.

Karen Favreau, a junior Sociology major at the University of Massachusetts, said that she knew hitchhiking was dangerous, but "I did it because I needed a ride."

Favreau said when she did hitchhike she was careful to do it in broad daylight. "I figured it was too early for any psycho's to be out," she said.

Jeff Baehrend, a senior English major, said he started hitchhiking because it was the only way he could visit his girlfriend in Boston.

Baehrend said he's never turned down a ride although some drivers have scared him at first.

"Once I got picked up by a guy in a Buick Skylark who had a screwdriver sticking out of the ignition. He said he had just gotten the car, but I thought he had stolen it," he said.

Baehrend said he considered trying to get out of the car, but needed to get to Boston. He said he was relieved when he arrived there safely.

Favreau said she would only hitchhike in the Amherst-Northampton area, because she thinks it is safer. "It's not reality here," she said.

But, she said, "If I ever ran into any trouble I'd hop out at a red light."

Sargeant Mark LaBranche, of the UMass police department, said if you do hitchhike "you have to watch what you're doing, because there's no way of judging what's going to happen."

"Women have to trust their gut instinct," said Laura Grohe, a former student coordinator for SCERA. "Every single woman I know who's had trouble said she had a bad feeling before she got into the car."

"When you do get into a car," said LaBranche, "get into a conversation with the driver and find out where they're coming from. Take a good look around, note it's interior, it's make, and who you're with."

Then he said, if something occurs while you're in the vehicle, you will be better able to report it later.

Favreau said if she was assaulted, "I really don't know if I'd report it, because they [the police] would make me feel guilty, like I was asking for it."

There is no reason to feel responsible, Grohe said. A hitchhiker is asking for a ride - not extending an invitation to be raped or sexually assaulted.

"I would recommend that women be more careful [than men]," said LaBranche. "If they are going to hitchhike, they should do so in groups."

But, Don Maia, the Amherst chief of police, said even hitchhiking in pairs can be dangerous. "There was a case where two women were hitchhiking together. One got in the car and the car drove off before the other one could get in," he said.

Maia said he doesn't think anyone should hitchhike at all. "Hitchhiking is like swimming alone," he said.

Other area experts agree. "Women are really putting themselves in a vulnerable position when they hitchhike," Grohe said. "Don't do it."

An unidentified woman thumbs a ride on North Pleasant St. last Friday.

If you do hitchhike, consider the following:

1. Try not to hitch by yourself, particularly at night.
2. Try not to hitch to deserted places, and make sure you know the route to your destination.
3. Never accept a ride with more than one man. Do not be afraid to say "No Thanks" to a larger group, and stay away from the door when you refuse.

When accepting a ride, do the following things before entering the car:

1. Make sure the driver or a passenger is not exposing himself, and that he is fully clothed.
2. Watch the driver to see if he is reaching for a concealed weapon.
3. Do not accept a ride from a person who changed directions to pick you up.
4. Ask how far the driver is going before you are asked where you are going. NEVER get dropped off directly where you are going.
5. Trust your intuition: If you do not feel comfortable accepting a ride, politely refuse.

Once in the car:

1. Keep your window partially down in case you have to scream.
2. If you wear a seat belt, make sure you know how to unfasten it.
3. In conversation, indicate that someone at your destination is expecting you by a certain time(this conveys that your absence would be missed).
4. If the driver decides to change his route, ask to be let out.

This list was compiled by Laura Grohe, former Student Coordinator SCERA.

EWC to offer limited counseling

By MARIA SACCHETTI
Collegian Staff

Personnel shifting and budget compromises at the Everywoman's Center this week have allowed the center to partially restore its counseling services.

Full counseling resources may be functioning by November but this restoration will be at the expense of another EWC program, Carol Wallace, EWC director said.

"I am in the process of trying to make an internal promotion that will enable us to provide some direct services, but it will create a vacancy in another program," she said.

Mercedes Del Valle, coordinator of the Women's Administrative and General Education Support program at EWC, has been promoted to a full-time employee and will be available to take crisis phone calls and make referrals, Wallace said.

The center is ordered to save more than $33,000 this year to meet budget cuts, Wallace said, but the promotion will reduce this amount by $2,000.

"Basically, the Department of Educational Access and Outreach (to which EWC reports) will cover the budget with savings from other programs," Wallace said.

Del Valle said she has "mixed feelings" about the promotion because the WAGES program, which offers support to non-tradtional, re-entry women students, is still slated for termination next semester because of University budget cuts.

"I feel bad about what's going to happen to WAGES. It took a while for women to feel they had a program and now that they do, it's going to be eliminated. They've been coming in a lot for help and [next semester] I won't be able to do that anymore," Del Valle said.

In addition to counseling and WAGES, Del Valle will facilitate a support group for Hispanic women beginning at the center this Saturday.

The support group will be conducted completely in Spanish and will address issues of cultural adjustment, academic and personal issues, Del Valle said.

"I want to bring a multi-cultural perspective to the program and make sure the needs of women of color are met because they haven't been met in the past," she said.

The support group will meet at EWC in Wilder Hall this Saturday from 10 a.m. to noon.

HEALTHWATCH

Measuring your heart rate during exercise

If you participate in aerobic exercise, such as running, swimming, biking, or an aerobic dance class, you should know how to determine your target heart rate, according exercise experts.

Your target heart rate represents the intensity of exercise needed to condition the heart and cardiovascular system without overexertion.

The American College of Sports Medicine recommends that you calculate both 60 percent and 90 percent of your maximum heart rate to find the low and high ends of your range.

To improve cardiovascular health, your exercise program should get your heart rate to at least 60 percent of your maximum and keep it there for at least 20 minutes.

Local aerobics instructors recommend taking your pulse when you first start breathing hard. If you are below your zone, work a bit harder. If your above it, slow down.

Take your pulse every 5 or 10 minutes during aerobic exercise and check it immediately after the aerobic part of the workout.

However, scientific studies have shown that taking your pulse to determine your heart rate is not always reliable, so watch your body for signs of overexertion while your exercising.

A dizzy or faint feeling, pounding in your chest, or profuse sweating are all warning signs to slow down. Be sure to cool down for 5 to 10 minutes before you end your workout.

The following formula can be used to determine your training heart rate:

	Sample 20-year old
Start with 220	220
Subtract your age.	- 20
Predicted maximum safe heart rate.	200
Multiply by .6 for 60 percent (the low end of your range)	x .6 = 120
Multiply by .9 for 90 percent (the high end of your range)	x .9 = 180

The question will not remove the sub-station, but may prompt the SGA to try to work with administration to have it moved.

As for turnout, Flanagan said 1,500 voted Tuesday.

"We had a fairly good turnout, but not as large as we expected," Case said.

Case said minor problems were encountered with lack of staffing for the ballot boxes, and not enough ballots in Franklin Dining Commons at the dinner voting session.

Just my opinion

An issue that is often ignored

This year's presidential campaign has, as usual, been the fashion and beauty show instead of a race concerned with issues.

Issues like whether or not Dan Quayle used some pull to guarantee himself a position in the national guard or that Mike Dukakis vetoed a pledge of allegiance bill which was already unconstitutional are only slightly important, if not just things the opposition and media can harp on.

Peter Leon

The real issues of this campaign are: continuing the bettering of relations between the Soviets and the U.S., reduction of arms, reducing the deficit, and finally one quiet, vague but important issue - the Supreme Court.

During the past 8 years President Reagan, in his infinite wisdom, has appointed 4 very conservative to just plain conservative people to the Court, thus creating a conservative majority. He also appointed Justice Rhenquist, the most staunchly conservative of all the justices, as Chief Justice of the United States.

The Supreme Court has the power to declare all laws enacted by the Congress and the States unconstitutional. It is a hefty responsibility. The point of view or bias of a Justice will affect his or her decision on a case. The questions brought before the Supreme Court affect everyone in the country. They include questions on civil rights, abortion, and criminal law. It is possible for the new conservative court to weaken or perhaps over turn previous decisions, like the Roe v. Wade decision legalizing abortions.

Now the issue. Three of the present Justices are liberal. They are also rather old (they are thinking of spending their golden years without the stress of making such difficult and complex decisions). It is the next President who will have the power to either cement the conservatives in power or put a liberal faction back in a position to bargain for and defend civil rights. Most of the new appointees will be around well into the new century and so making decisions to affect our grand children.

George Bush will obviously want to continue with the "Reagan revolution" and appoint people who believe people have no right to ask their government to perform simple tasks for them, probably like providing affordable housing or medical care. If George were in a real wild mood he might try to appoint someone like Bork, the guy who thought he knew what the founders of this here country were thinking. Mike Dukakis would at least appoint liberal people who could balance out the court and perhaps save some of the rights that we take for granted and certain conservatives would like to see taken away.

Certain issues, like women's issues, would have a better chance because Justice Sandra Day-O'Connor might swing to the liberal side on some of those issues, if there were at least a liberal minority. Should the Court become solidly conservative, I fear, no matter who is President or in Congress in the new century will have to fight for every piece of new legislation, not just on the floor of the House or Senate, but in front of the Supreme Court too. In other words, when I think of President George Bush, or even worse President Quayle, the phrase "Something wicked this way comes" comes to mind.

A simple right taken for granted

Thursday, October 6, 1988. In Santiago, Chile, thousands rush into the streets celebrating the electoral defeat of President Augusto Pinochet and what will hopefully be the end of 15 years of military rule. "I feel free! I have the right to walk in the streets again, to express myself, to not be afraid," said Juan Carlos Muraga, a 21 year old Chilean student. He and thousands of others are celebrating something of immeasurable value to them — democracy.

Bob Bobala

Now take a skip up to North America where we've had a democratic government for over two hundred years. You don't see many people walking around rejoicing and shouting "I feel free" anymore. I suppose that's to be expected. After 200 years, freedom's euphoria has worn off and Americans have mellowed out. But our mellowness seems to be slowly turning to apathy.

This is evident in statistics which show that over the last three decades the number of people exercising their right to vote — one of the most vital rights we have — has steadily declined in the United States. In the 1960 presidential election 63.1 percent of eligible voters showed up at the polls (not an overwhelming figure to begin with). The five presidential elections following 1960 saw voter turnout decrease to as low as 53.2 percent in 1980.

I do have to give you the straight facts though. In 1984, when Reagan crushed Mondale, 53.3 percent of eligible voters voted. An increase of a whole tenth of a percent. Big deal.

So basically, only about half of all American citizens who are 18 and older vote in the election to choose the person who will sit in the most powerful position in the free world. Why?

I suppose there are some reasons that are better than others. Unlike many democratic nations, we hold our elections on a working day. After working a twelve hour day I doubt I'd feel like dragging myself to the polls. An "Election Day" holiday might make it easier for people to vote.

Then again, a day off for voting might just give us an extra day to sleep in. The excuses I heard from some people who didn't vote in the Massachusetts primary weren't that they had to work all day and were too tired. They either didn't know that it was election day, or they were playing tennis, or they had to study.

Yeah, I guess giving up a half hour of your time once every four years just to keep your country running could be too burdensome. Oh, wait a minute, I almost forgot that you have to register to vote at least once in your life too. Subtract another half an hour from the 70 plus years you'll live.

If you're not just too lazy, and if you don't have to work from 7:00 a.m. to 10:00 p.m. on election day, I guess you still could have a couple of reasons for not wanting to vote. You might feel alienated by you government and just hate politics in general. But you can't change anything if you don't vote. Or, you might feel that the government is doing a great job and your life has never been more stable. But if you don't vote, things could change in a hurry.

Or, you could be like me, who, in the past month, considered not voting at all in the upcoming presidential election to protest my dissatisfaction with the candidates. This will be the first presidential election in which I will be eligible to vote. I guess I had always envisioned voting for someone who I thought would be an outstanding leader and a great president. When neither Bush nor Dukakis filled my expectation of what I thought a president should be, I became discouraged.

I hate the thought of voting for the candidate that I dislike the least. But no matter what, I'll show up at the polls in November. Down in South America Juan Carlos Muraga is shouting "I feel free." It's the first time in his life that he's been able to say that. I've never said that. I live in America. My freedom has been taken for granted. The least I can do is not take my right to vote for granted.

Bob Bobala is a Collegian columnist

They said it. . .

So far in the presidential campaign this year neither candidate nor his running mate has made a speech that was worth hearing or, by any standard other than the meanest calculations of political advantage, worth delivering. What is more, we do not expect to hear anything resembling a memorable speech before the election is over.

If voter turnout is lower in 1988 than even in other recent elections, this oratorical void will be one reason. After months of wearisome campaigning, the differences between the the candidates and the the parties are more blurred than at the beginning.

—Henry Fairlie, The New Republic, Oct. 10

A parade of assumptions

The campaign: wrapped up in psuedo-patriotism

The future occupant of the White House and the ultimate fate of the most powerful country on the planet will hinge on merely 31 words.

Here they are: I pledge allegiance to the flag of the United States of America and to the republic for which it stands, one nation, under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

Only in the American political process could something as seemingly innocuous as the Pledge of Allegiance be blown up into the major factor that will influence who shall become the most powerful man in our nation. Should we care who supports the Pledge or not? Why are the presidential candidates arguing over this when they should be discussing the more important and far-reaching issues such as the budget deficit, health care and the environment?

But all those issues require serious thought and deliberate contemplation. The American public might just have to (gasp) think through an issue. The Pledge of Allegiance is one of those easy flashpoints which instantly touch the heart and soul of the average American citizen, especially the elusive "Reagan Democrat." For many Americans, to refute the Pledge is a sacrilege, an attack on the foundations of the United States and everything that is good about this country.

Stephen Bayer

Why this hyper-sensitivity? Perhaps it is because, as children, we are indoctrinated from day one with the Pledge. We are never given explanation of why we must repeat this oath every day in school, nor are we given a crash course in civics to explain the meaning behind it. At that young age, we just do as we are told and do not challenge. By the time we reach adulthood, the Pledge is considered one of those things that is simply not questioned. To deny or to truly scrutinize the Pledge is to challenge the very foundations upon which we were raised. It is frightening for many people to analyze and possibly refute the very core of their values, beliefs and morals.

Thus, in a campaign that was going to hell in a handbasket, Republican candidate George Bush decided to hit the low road and catch on something that people did not really need to think about or critically analyze, they just needed to feel it.

To his credit, Democratic candidate Michael Dukakis has avoided getting mired in the Pledge-bashing. He spelled out a sound constitutional reason for vetoing a Massachusetts bill that would have required teachers to lead their classes every day with the pledge: freedom of speech. And in the presidential debate, Dukakis lashed out at Bush for impugning his patriotism: "I resent it." But that's the extent of what we have heard from the governor on the subject.

Meanwhile, Bush goes parading around New Jersey flag factories, looking more ridiculous with each photo opportunity. His slime-and-smear tactics, constantly harping on the Pledge, simply underscore the fact that Bush's campaign is vacuous, completely devoid of issues and lacking any substance.

If Bush is truly committed to the ideals of liberty and justice for all, maybe he should add the U.S. Constitution to his reading list. Therein he would find the basic tenets and values of this country, including the foundation for freedom of expression which applies even to the Pledge. Until then, perhaps Bush would be wise to remember another favorite saying: Patriotism is the last refuge of the scoundrel.

A Sunday morning bathroom surprise

I know that you are all probably tired of reading about the deplorable conditions that one must live under in the dorms, but I feel that my story deserves to be told. I had the most unpleasant experience that I have ever had in all my three years of dorm living. What I experienced a few weeks ago goes beyond the usual inconveniences of noisy neighbors, roommate's unexpected overnight guests, loud stereos, trashed hallways, and any other annoyances that one can think of. These things I can live with.

Late one Sunday morning I got up to take a shower. I was feeling a little ill and was looking forward to an exhilarating experience. Instead I received a rude awakening, literally.

I swung open the door and the first thing that hit me, as my eyes still weren't in focus yet, was a foul odor. The stench was worse than usual, but I simply dismissed it as a better party than last weekend's. I shuffled past the sinks in a sleepy stupor, still unaware of what was in store for me around the corner. I carefully stepped over the puddles left by drinks spilled and flooding of the plumbing and pushed open the shower stall door. I bent over with a groan as my head started to pound as I put down my toilet articles. Suddenly, I spied something lurking in the corner of the shower stall next to me. Since I still hadn't washed the sleepies out of my eyes, it looked to me like a bar of natural organic soap or something. I rubbed my eyes, looked again, and recognized something which would belong next to a fire hydrant. Get my drift? (I sure did.) This was no accident. The person left it there for everyone to admire.

Laura Robinson

After that, taking a shower didn't appeal to me anymore. I hurried back to my room with an astonished look on my face. A feeling of horror rose inside of me as I thought of the animal that must be living in my dorm — or at least visiting on the weekends. I thought maybe I had dreamt it, or maybe I was in some strange John Waters movie like Pink Flamingos. It was someone's sick idea of a joke but I didn't find it humorous. This was the last thing that I wanted to be subjected to on a Sunday morning with a slight hangover. I felt sorry for the poor cleaning lady who had to come in the next morning. I felt embarrassed to face her even though I had no part in it.

What would ever possess someone to do something like that? Wouldn't that person be ashamed? People may be slovenly at home as well as at school but that is something that one would certainly not do at home, never mind someone else's home. Some think nothing of trashing another's home on the weekends because they don't have to live with it. They are selfish and self-centered people. Now, I am not a prude. I don't mind a little rubble after a wild party, but there are limits. I have also worked at a nursing home and am aware of areas of the world that don't have proper facilities for these purposes. We, on the other hand, are supposed to be civilized and rational people. Are we regressing to time of the decline of Rome?

My unpleasant experience in the dorm brought new meaning to the analogy that the dorms are like cells or cages and the UMass is like a zoo. That person justified the reputation that those who are proud of the University of Massachusetts would like to forget and put behind us. When my parents came to visit me on parent's weekend, I was reluctant to allow them to use the bathroom after their long, ride. I'm even embarrassed to have friends from other schools visit. Should I have to be? I think not.

Pornography: a mainstay in American culture

By COSMO MACERO JR.
Collegian Staff

pornography: writings, pictures, items — intended primarily to arouse sexual desires Websters New World Dictionary

As far back in time as the written word can take us, sex has been a topic of controversy, secrecy, and intrigue. From the sexual ground rules set down in the book of Leviticus, to the risque stage plays of 18th century France, to the touchy subject matter of Hawthorne's Scarlet Letter, the topic of sex has been aptly dealt with throughout the history of literature.

However, man does not live by word alone, and with the growth of film in the early 20th century (as we totally ignore the 19th century), filmmakers immediately began to test the limits of what could be splashed on a 20-foot screen in front of a few hundred people.

Even today, when an 11-year old can get a visual female anatomy lesson at a PG film, directors (i.e. "9½ Weeks","Angel Heart") skirt the boundaries of decency, careful to avoid the deadly "X" rating, which is a one way ticket to box office disaster.

While "X" once meant Emmanuelle Around the World (where the good stuff gets cut just as they hit the bed), it's now a slap on the wrist to naughty filmmakers like Scorcese, DePalma, and Romero.

Triple-X, however, is a different story. Welcome to Traci Lords' playhouse, where "age of consent" is a forbidden phrase.

The demonstration of explicit sex acts, ranging from the old standards to the truly amazing, can liven a drowsy audience in no time. However, whereas at one time our perception of pornography included a picture of dirty old men shuffling down dark alleys into sleazy movie houses, today things are different.

The conservative shift in national attitudes during the past 6 or 7 years, coupled with the rapid growth of the home video industry has dried up the market for big screen adult films, spawning corporate buyouts of many red-light districts such as Boston's Combat Zone.

Credit this cultural change to shifting market demands, or moral awareness; in any case, the "face of pornography" is a changing one. Other forms of exploitation, particularly the use of gratuitous violence, often meet with negative reactions considerably more hostile than those in response to run-of-the-mill skin flicks. While everyone knows the story with the Rambo series, it's HBO specials like "Why Did Johnny Kill?" that point out the violence that results from an unstable kid watching Jason thinslice a camp full of zany teens.

Herschel Gordon Lewis, schlock film emperor of the 60's, made his name by exposing the internal organs of attractive young women (against their will, of course). His blood-spattered masterpieces, while truly nauseating, are considered legitimate works of black humor, and maintain cult-film status. Just good clean fun, regardless of the wholesale dispensing of death.

The bottom line has always been: "If you're offended... don't watch." Every film, no matter how stupid, mindless, or disgusting, has some artistic merit. Finding the redeeming social value in a third class film can be fun, whether it's "Day of the Dead" or "Debbie Does Dallas."

A look at new releases from Aussie artists

By GRAEME THOMSON
Collegian Correspondent

Question: What's Australian, wooden, stupid-looking and no matter how many times you try and chuck it away, it keeps coming back to you?

Disc Junkie

Answer: An INXS album.

It's funny at Christmas how relatives think the way to appease fash and trendy "present problem" pop kids like you and me is to buy them completely naff albums like INXS' "Kick."

Perhaps then, it might do them some good to cut off their ears and sellotape them to any unfortunate pair of speakers struggling to contain the mind-wrenchingly orgasmic and above all, totally evil sound of Lubricated Goat, whose two albums, "The Devil's Music" and "Paddock of Love," have been causing quite a stir on local alternative music stations.

"In The Raw" kicking off "Paddock" displays a voice which cannot be human, sounding as it does like a puking rhino, while "Spectator" ends "The Devils Music" with a tanlged, strangled opus of reverse tape loops; guitars fight for space with pneumatic drill type sounds and the whole concoction is spiked with a lethal dose of acid.

It's not the kind of music to mark your life by unless of course, you're severely disturbed. Let's just say that if this band played a satantist convention the audience would be paying to join the mormons.

On a completely different note - a musical one - ex-Saints and Laughing Clowns front man Ed Kuepper has a new album "Everybody's Got To" out on the Hot label. I must say I never had much time for Kuepper's two previous outfits but he's really found himself as a solo artist. "Everybody Got To" is a glorious collection of great songs. Imagine antipodean cousins the Go-Betweens minus the wimpy self-consciousness. A definite must. Talking of the Go-Betweens, their new album "16 Lovers Lane" is currently available on import on Beggar's Banquet records with no sign of a release date in this country. However, if you've got the cash it's well worth checking out. Basically it further refines the gloomy romanticism of "Tallulah" and maintains the tradition of putting a double 'l' in their album titles.

Feelies stay minimal on "Only Life"

By JOHN SWANSON
Collegian Staff

Only Life
The Feelies
A&M/Coyote

The final track on the Feelies' latest album is a cover of the Velvet Underground's "What Goes On." This is not so much an homage to Lou Reed's minimalists as it is an anthem for the Feelies themselves.

Like VU, the Haledon, New Jersey fivesome works with frenzied rhythms, introspective lyric poetry and many layers of simple but varied guitar sounds.

Only Life, their third LP as the Feelies (other incarnations include the Trypes, Yung Wu and the Willies), is their best effort to date. The rhythms here are generally slower than those of previous projects, but the result is high art.

Glenn Mercer and Bill Million use their guitars to hover around and support tunes like "Deep Fascination," "The Final Word" and "It's Only Life." Bassist Brenda Sauter and percussionists Dave Weckerman and Stan Demeski provide the rhythms so crucial to "Too Much," "For Awhile" and "Away," the album's best cut. "Too Far Gone," which also appears on the soundtrack to Jonathan Demme's film Married to the Mob, is great guitar rock 'n' roll. Mercer's energized solo is perhaps the LP's finest moment.

"The Undertow," previously released on the Trypes album, is an aural masterpiece. A rain of percussion converses with Million's twelve-string while Mercer's vocals are not so much a feature as an additional support. The slow southern flavor of "Higher Ground" is also worth a listen.

Mercer's lyrics resemble those of the Velvets as well. Echoes of VU's "After Hours" can be heard in "It's Only Life": "Lock your doors / Close all your windows / And hide away." Mercer's reserved, frequently tuneless vocals recall those of a younger Reed.

It is unfair to categorize the Feelies as VU wanna-bes; an array of musical influences are apparent in all of their work. However, the two bands are known for their underground following and their ability to convey the complex with the simple.

When the Velvet Underground dissolved in the early 1970s,they had achieved little popular success. Yet they introduced to rock 'n' roll a model of simplicity that would be exalted in the decades to come. The Feelies have taken that example well.

This time, don't miss out.

racially motivated.

Grant Ingle, one of the coordinators of the events, said right now there are about 80 events tentatively planned and "they are still coming in."

"In previous years we've had people put on events for the campus," Ingle said. "This year, we are asking the entire campus to put on events."

The three purposes of Civility Day are to raise awareness of racism, celebrate multicultural diversity, and highlight existing programs and activities that foster an atmosphere of openness and tolerance on campus.

Faculty, staff, and students are all sponsoring various events for the week, according to Jason Rabinowitz, Student Government Association president-elect and a student coordinator of the week.

"We have films, videos, lectures, discussions, panels, workshops, radio shows, discussions in class," Ingle said of the numerous activities planned.

Lectures, colloquia, workshops, and dance and theater performances are also among the plans and possibilities for the week. Racism will be the main focus and groups with other concerns are being invited to offer events linking their issues with those of racism.

Rabinowitz said "Hands Across UMass" that will stretch from Sylvan Residential Area all the way to Southwest, is in the works. Also, a "Rock Against Racism" dance is planned.

Groups Big Daddy Kane and B.D.P. will appear at a concert at 8 p.m. Oct. 26 in the Fine Arts Center.

There will be a rally on the Student Union steps Oct. 27, the second anniversary of the Southwest brawl. A continuous six hour showing of "Eyes on the Prize," a PBS series on civil rights, will be shown from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. Oct. 24 in room 174 of the Campus Center.

Rabinowitz said a student organizational meeting will be held at 7 p.m. tonight in the New Africa House, after which a schedule of the events will be made available.

Asbestos removal almost finished

GEORGE FRANCY
Collegian Staff

Tobin Hall will soon be free of asbestos because of an $800,000 asbestos removal project, according to a Physical Plant official.

Peter Wozniak, director of operations for the Physical Plant, said the asbestos should be completely removed by Nov. 15. This project is part of a larger effort to remove or contain all asbestos on campus.

A contractor has been hired to handle the Tobin removal, which Director of the Physical Plant Roger Cherewatti described as one of the biggest ever undertaken on campus. "The academic community has been outstanding in cooperating with us during a difficult period," Cherewatti said.

"At any given time we've got 20 contracted employees working on removal of asbestos from pipes, valves, and floor tiles," Wozniak said.

He added that there is still a lot of asbestos left in buildings on this campus which has not been removed because of a lack of money.

"If we were to take all of the asbestos on this campus out, I would estimate the number of man-hours needed to be in the tens of millions," Wozniak said. He said this would cost upwards of $50 million.

Wozniak said when Tobin Hall was built in the 1970s, the mechanical room was sprayed with asbestos, which is used as a fire retardant and as an insulator.

He said over time spray-on asbestos becomes easily friable. This means it can break apart and become airborne, and can be inhaled. It was later learned that asbestos causes three major illnesses.

When asbestos is breathed in, it can settle in the lungs, leading to asbestosis, the most common malady resulting from breathing asbestos. It may also cause lung cancer, or mesophelioma, a cancer of the lining of the lungs, Wozniak said.

He said workers removing asbestos are required to wear full-body suits and respirators.

Zoodisc holds the ultimate tourney

By DEBORAH PICARDI
Collegian Correspondent

The largest ultimate Frisbee tournament in the world was held this weekend at the University of Massachusetts' Southwest playing fields.

The annual tournament, which was shortened to two days due to inclement weather, featured some of the finest ultimate teams in the United States and celebrated the 20th anniversary of the sport, according to ZooDisc, the University's men's frisbee team.

The tournament was hosted by ZooDisc and Zulu, the UMass women's Frisbee team. Over 80 clubs, from as far away as Washington DC and Delaware, participated. Most, however were from the New York, New England area, according to ZooDisc member Bill Stewart.

Teams were organized into pools of men's Division I and Division II, and a women's division. Division II and the women's division consisted of collegiate players, while Division I consisted of more experienced clubs ranked through previous tournaments.

Last year's national championship team, "New York, New York," beat their rivals "Titanic," a club from Boston, by a score of 17-14 in Division I, Stewart said.

The women's division final was played by two Boston-based teams. "Smithereens" beat "Lady Godiva" by a score of 19-17, he said.

In the Division II competition, things were a little more laid back. Due to the 40 degree temperatures and harsh winds, many teams chose to leave on Saturday. Sunday was more of a free-for-all with teams playing each other for fun, Stewart said.

Stewart and Jay Watson, another ZooDisc member, won the grueling "Iron Man" competition that was held as half time entertainment on Sunday afternoon. Eight teams competed in this two-on-two single elimination contest, which lasts 28 continuous minutes. This gave the spectators more exposure to the excitement of the game, Stewart said.

The Ultimate Frisbee Northeast Regionals will be held at UMass on November 5th and 6th. The top 16 men's teams and top 10 women's teams from New York and New England will try to qualify for the National Championships to be held in San Diego over Thanksgiving weekend. Stewart said that only the top three teams will move on to that level. Spectators are always welcome at these tournaments, and the teams appreciate the support.

Stewart, the only remaining member of UMass' 1986 Collegiate National Championship team, said "This year we are starting with a lot of new players, but what lack in experience, we more than make up for in heart."

■water polo to host tournament

"They have more depth than Amherst, and a good driver (shooter), but they're weak in goal," Yarworth said. UMass should be able to turn the matches into two more marks in the win column, according to Yarworth.

Even more important is that these games will provide the coach with an idea of what to work on before they head into the league tournament at Harvard the following weekend.

"We're good in goal [but] we need to work on our communication and get a little more team work going. We've had more depth than we've ever had before. now we want to bring the whole team level up," Yarworth said.

Some of the high scorers so far this season have been senior Eric Bebchick with 25 goals and a .490 shooting percentage; sophomore Jon Miller (23, .500); and junior Roger Kennedy (12, .546). On defense, Miller leads the way with 23 steals with sophomore Craig Siegel (10) and junior Brian McIver (12).

Following closely were Laura LaVallee in 18:44, and both Kristen Peers and Amy St. Pierre in 18:56. This threesome, according to LaFreniere, "looked like they were really working hard the whole race with no break."

Cathy Crocker crossed the line in 19:05, significantly closing the gap between her and St. Pierre. "Cathy had a phenomenal day. She ran the gutsiest race I've seen yet," LaFreniere said. Lynn Kirchoff, Kathy Holt and Wendy Lofgren rounded out the top nine spots for the Minutewomen.

"I'm really proud of our team. They worked hard and deserve this win," LaFreniere said. "Two weeks ago it was nice to kill Springfield for a confidence boost, but they had to work harder for Friday's win. They didn't walk way with it. Brown was tough and they never gave up."

Saturday, the Minutewomen face their next challenge at the Holy Cross Invitational. LaFreniere feels that the Minutewomen's biggest competition will be the University of Vermont, who acquired several key recruits this season.

"At last year's invitational, we finished third, but Saturday we could possibly finish in the top two. It's nice to see the Massachusetts women dominating again," said LaFreniere, still smiling.

■men's x-country

"UConn put pressure on us the first two miles," O'Brien said. "But I was pleased at how well Boyle and Milette handled the pressure. Once they pulled away around the fourth mile they both held back a little because of our upcoming races."

O'Brien was pleased by the performance of his middle runners, which had been a sore spot in recent weeks. Juniors Herbert Hefner (32:09), Thomas Degnan (32:10) and Gerry Squires (32:21) finished fifth, sixth and eighth resepctively. The coach labeled the trio "my three key people," and went on to praise them.

"They responded very well to the hard, early pace the UConn kids set. I think this was a real positive indicator of things to come."

The Minutemen will look to keep their winning ways Saturday when they travel to Durham, N.H. for the Easterns.

Extra Laps: O'Brien plans to sit out his top five runners on Saturday. "With four conference championships in a row we'll save our top five for the Atlantic 10 meet next week," he said . . . UMass improved its record against Connecticut to 23-9 . . . the junior varsity men's team tied UConn on Saturday at 27.5 points apiece. Minuteman freshman Tim Campbell tied UConn's Billy Owens for first place in the five-mile race with a time of 26:27.

season and in the playoffs. But she has returned healthy this year and has contributed three goals and two assists to the UMass attack.

Sophomore Elise McDevitt, after seeing a lot of significant playing time last year, is coming off the bench this year and is filling that roll perhaps as well as anyone could, having already scored five goals. McDevitt scored six goals in all of 1987.

And a new addition to the attack, freshman Dawn Trumbauer has helped keep opposing defenses on their heels in every game. The promising young forward has scored two goals to date having earned a starting job before the Minutewomen's opening game. Hixon has described her as a "very explosive" player.

Not much has to be said about the defense. UMass has limited opposing attacks to just three goals in 12 games. Senior goaltender Cindy Cox has registered nine shutouts.

The UMass defense has protected Cox well. She has not seen many shots come her way all season but when she has they have been tough shots which which Cox has almost always turned away. She is leading the Atlantic 10 Conference in goaltending with a 0.25 goals against average.

One major defensive change that Hixon made right before the Old Dominion game has really paid off for the Minutewomen. Before that game, Hixon moved senior Julie Stuart from her right back position to sweeper. Junior Carol Smith was moved to right back.

"I think that has really solidified our defense," Hixon said. "Julie has been excellent. I have to say that's been the most positive move we've made throughout the season. I think Julie has been the key to firming up that already stingy defense."

The play of Smith and senior Chris Gutheil has not gone unnoticed by Hixon.

"Carol Smith and Chris Gutheil are just playing steady. They are very steady players that don't too much that is flashy but they are what I call hard nose defenders.," Hixon said.

Fairfield should not give that defense too much trouble. The Stags have only scored three goals in eight games in which they have been 1-7.

Senior goalie Karen Merchant has given up 26 goals already in the Stags first season in which they play a Division I schedule.

"They were very anxious to play us and during this time last year we were off for a week and I felt that took an edge away from us," Hixon said.

■yo-yo

by the Detroit Pistons in six games in the semifinals. Is the brick wall tumbling down?

The yo-yo is in a sleeper.

The New England Patriots are 2-4 at this point. Last weekend the previously-winless Green Bay Packers shellacked them to the tune of 45-3. That score represents the second-worst loss in team history.

What happened to the Patriots' tenacious defense of years past? It has retired in the form of Steve Nelson and Don Blackmon. No longer do the Pats boast the best linebacking corps in the league. They are in a rebuilding stage, trying to get back into Super Bowl form.

The yo-yo can still rise.

Never knowing where the yo-yo will be haunts us all. Three years ago Boston was considered the number one sports town in America, and we the fans were proud of our teams. Now we are not considered the top sports town, and many fans are down on certain players on the home team. This is not a fair judgment, but a fair weather fan judgment. The yo-yo can still rise to the highest level. The string has not broken — it just needs a little more wax. And a little faith.

UConn takes it from UMass, 2-0

Mistakes costly as Minutemen hand game away to rival Huskies

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

Everyone knows their lines. The script is more than familiar. The actors are the University of Massachuetts men's soccer team, and the story is called "how to give away a soccer game that really would have been nice to win."

The latest episode of this season-long serial unfolded upon the frigid tundra of Upper Boyden Field yesterday afternoon, where the University of Connecticut Huskies trotted off with a 2-0 win over the Minutemen.

A defensive miscue fed the Huskies a 1-0 lead, as a painfully hesitant exchange between sweeper Mike McCormick and goalkeeper Sam Ginzburg allowed UConn (9-5-1) forward Brian Anderson his first goal of the season.

"I hit it too soft," said McCormick of his pass back to Ginzburg that never got there. Anderson raced in before Ginzburg could pick up the ball and chipped it over the surprised senior goaltender. "I felt him (Anderson) coming, I just hit the ball soft."

The Minutemen, now 7-6 on the season, had appeared mentally ready to upset the Huskies, who entered the contest as the No. 2 ranked team in New England. UMass had threatened UConn goalie Tom Foley several times in the first half — a Carl Hanks drive pounded off the right goal post, and an extra aggressive defensive slide tackle was needed to break up a Brett Anthony breakaway early in the contest.

But following Anderson's sneak attack, the breeze left the Minutemen's sails. Or more accurately, the arctic blast that blew all afternoon turned against Gettler's squad in the second half, helping the Huskies plug the ball in UMass's half of the field. The Minutemen did muster a brief response midway through the half — Steve Cesnek tested Foley on a runaway train-style solo fast break, and Andy Schwartz placed a loose ball in front of the UConn net for the taking. But the Minutemen weren't in a capitalizing mood.

When UConn's offensive persistence paid off in the form of an insurance goal by Brian Parker off an assist from two time All-American forward Dan Donigan at the 80:38 mark, the true drama of this contest was done. All that remained was the deliverence of a now familiar epilogue . . .

"We did it again," explained UMass head coach Jeff Gettler. "We gave away a goal, and that's what we've been doing against the better teams, which is why we're not a better team then we are."

Free Kicks: UMass freshman fullback Dan Lawrence turned in an extra-impressive performance against the Huskies, for whom older brother Bill Lawrence is the starting sweeper . . . "He's been our steadiest player," praised Gettler of Dan Lawrence following the game . . . Donigan gets a lot of press, but a mere four goals on the season (and a Danny Ainge-like demeanor) could work against him when it comes time to hand out the Herrmann Trophy to the best player in the land at years' end . . . Next up, the Minutemen will host Northeastern, Saturday at 11 a.m.

Ups and downs of a Boston fan

The yo-yo comes down.

The Red Sox' season is over, as they were swept out of the American League Championship Series by the Oakland Athletics. After a 19-1 start under manager Joe Morgan following the All-Star break, the BoSox went a dismal 1-10 to end the season. The Morgan Magic has vanished. Some will say the BoSox backed their way into the AL East pennant. Perhaps they are correct.

Eric Langer

Where was the heartbreak so many Sox fans have come to expect? The Sox were winless in the championship series. There wasn't a time when the fans believed the Sox could beat the A's. There was no climax, no dashed expectations from seasons past. Such is the life of a Boston sports fan.

The yo-yo goes up.

The Bruins' season has begun with three straight victories. Despite losing three of the four starting defensemen in Gord Kluzak, Glen Wesley and Michael Thelven, the B's have come together as a team behind their leader, Ray Bourque.

Last season the B's were over-achievers, reaching the Stanley Cup Finals ior the first time since 1972. The Montreal Canadien playoff jinx was finally broken after many disappointing losses. Although the Bruins lost in four straight games to the Edmonton Oilers, history must be observed. The very same Oilers were swept by the New York Islanders in their first Stanley Cup appearance, and won it all the very next year.

The yo-yo comes down.

The Celtics are supposed to win. They are the mortar in the layers of Boston sports bricks from years past. When all other Boston teams fail to climb the mountain, the Celtics will reach the peak.

They boast the best starting five in basketball, perhaps of all time, and are not capable of losing in our minds and hearts. Last season the Celtics failed to make it to the finals, getting bumped off

Field hockey gets passing grades at midseason

Takes on Fairfield today

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

It is half way into the season for the University of Massachusetts field hockey team and before it faces off with Fairfield University today (3 p.m., Totman Field) it is time for the Minutewomen to get their midterm grades.

But UMass will not be racing to the mailbox to get its report card before its parents can get their hands on it. It is honor roll all the way for the Minutewomen.

Through its first 12 games, UMass is 10-1-1, ranked No. 3 in the country by the NCAA and ranked No. 1 in New England. Its only blemish is a 1-0 overtime loss to top ranked Old Dominion University.

The attack, with the exception of the ODU and West Chester University games, has been unstoppable. The Minutewomen have already scored 33 goals this season, well ahead of the 19 that they had scored at this time last season.

"The attack is much, much deeper," UMass coach Pam Hixon said. "In every game we're playing five forwards so they are all game ready, they all have excellent experience. I think I have five excellent forwards who can do the job and that's really helped us a lot and we're getting scoring from everyone which is nice."

Last year, junior Kathy DeAngelis had to carry the Minutewomen attack. Her 19 goals and no assists made her the only player on the team to score in double figures. But this season, the load has been taken off of DeAngelis' shoulders. In fact, DeAngelis has already dished out three assists this year to go with her seven goals.

One reason that DeAngelis' game has not been so one-dimensionable this year is the return of senior forward Tonia Kennedy and junior forward Mara Frattasio. Kennedy sat out all of last season with an injury. Right now, she is leading the Minutewomen in scoring with 10 goals and one assist.

Frattasio sat out most of last season with an injury before seeing spot duty towards the end of the regular

UMass cross country teams pick up important wins

● Minutemen cruise past Connecticut

By JOHN STEVEN MARPLE
Collegian Correspondent

Most students were doing one of three things last Friday afternoon. The may have been making plans to go home for the three-day weekend. If they weren't going home, they were making plans for the night. Or maybe they were thinking about the Red Sox chances' in the playoffs.

But the University of Massachusetts men's cross country team was doing none of the aforementioned things. No, it was taking care of business.

And by the time the Minutemen were through, they had defeated the University of Connecticut in a 6.2 mile race, 22-33.

"I thought it would be a close battle," said UMass coach Ken O'Brien. "The meet met my expectations."

Senior Kerry Boyle and junior Joe Milette of UMass shared first place with a time of 31:23. UConn's Chris Griffith finished behind the UMass duo in 31:58.

University of Massachusetts women's cross country coach Julie LaFreniere wearing a grin a mile wide and for good reason.

Her team increased its season record to 3-2 as the Minutewomen trampled Brown University and the University of Connecticut here last Friday. This was the second home meet of the year and every one of the Minutewomen significantly bettered their times.

Freshman Precious Hill, who won the race in 18:19, dropped a minute and four seconds off her 19:23 finish two weeks ago. Shana Smith finished second in 18:28. Both Hill and Smith broke the 18:32 course record set by Martha Grinnell of Springfield.

UMass water polo preparing for 'home' tournament this weekend

By DENNIS MADSEN
Collegian Correspondent

This weekend, as most everyone knows, is Homecoming, and in recognition of this, the University of Massachusetts water polo team is playing this season's only set of home games, Friday and Saturday night. Well, sort of.

The games are actually being held at Amherst College Pool, since the UMass campus doesn't have the proper facilities to host a regulation water polo match. But it's still close enough to home for students to go see the team play.

"Water polo is really an exciting sport," says coach Russ Yarworth. "People have probably been exposed to it, watching the Olympics and now it's a chance to see the game close-up."

This weekend offers two good games for the Minutemen. The first is Friday night at 8 p.m. against the host team, Amherst. In their previous meeting, UMass beat the Lord Jeffs, 11-6, but the match still has Yarworth nervous.

"Amherst has three very good players who could start for [the UMass] team," Yarworth said, "and they have an excellent hole man." The hole man is like a center in basketball, a very pivotal position. Amherst also runs an excellent man-up, or power play, offense. But, says Yarworth, "if we stick to our defensive game plan, we can handle them."

The following evening, at 5:30 p.m., they face Boston College. The Eagles are similar to Amherst in that they have a big, fast hole man, but the players around him aren't as strong.

Women's tennis in action today

The University of Massachusetts women's tennis team will be in action this afternoon, as the Minutewomen prepare to take on Tufts University. Time of the match is 3 p.m. on the Upper Boyden Courts.

The men's team will host Clark University tomorrow at 3 p.m. on the Boyden Courts.

UMass football doing us proud

By MATT GERKE
Collegian Staff

Q. How many people thought the University of Massachusetts football team would be 4-1 after five games?

A. At least 110, but probably not a whole lot more.

But the 95 men who suit up each Saturday and the 15 men who coach them obviously believed it and that has been enough.

After last season's 3-8 record, most people viewed the 1988 Minutemen with guarded optimism.

Yet they have played well, and established themselves as the No. 9 team in the nation in Division 1-AA while winning four of their first five games.

"We're in control of our own destiny," strong safety Vaughn Williams said after last week's win over the University of Rhode Island. "That's the way we wanted it to be."

Tomorrow, UMass will have a big say in its future when it meets a Yankee Conference rival, the University of Connecticut, at 1:30 p.m. at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

Broadcast of racial insults sparks uproar

By ANTHONY PADOVANO
Collegian Staff

Racially insulting remarks made over a Physical Plant radio frequency on Wednesday Oct. 5 have spurred an investigation by Physical Plant officials and have caused a furor among plant employees.

According to a source who requested anonymity, words to the effect of "F-----g dumb black bitch," were broadcast over Physical Plant frequency one, a frequency normally reserved for foremen and supervisors.

The source, whose claims were confirmed by several other Physical Plant employees, said the person who made the remarks did not realize his radio was transmitting.

Roger Cherewatti, the Physical Plant director, said the investigation began immediately after the remarks were brought to his attention, and he hopes to have the situation resolved by this afternoon. He said the investigation is being done with the help of the University of Massachusetts Affirmative Action Office.

The Physical Plant operates on two two-way frequencies. Frequency one is normally reserved for upper level employees at Physical Plant and frequency two is used for mobile units dispatched from the Physical Plant.

The racist broadcast could have been heard by anyone with a radio tuned to frequency one.

Dennis Hmieleski, the radio dispatcher on duty at the Physical Plant when the comments were made, said he was shocked by the language used.

"I was very taken aback by what I heard. I couldn't believe what I was hearing. That is the first time I ever heard anything of that type on the radio in my 13 years," he said.

Hmieleski said a question many of the employees were asking was how the Physical Plant administration will discipline the culprit. "They are the ones who hire and fire. Let's see if they can do it to one of their own. Is there a double standard?"

Though there has been no official statement from University officials about who is suspected, most employees who would comment said they believe it is an upper level supervisor.

Paul Davis, an employee in sheet metal and plumbing at the plant who heard the broadcast, said a lot of people at the plant do not want to say who they think the culprit is.

[Because of the sensitivity of the issue, the Collegian feels it is inappropriate at this time to disclose the name of the person being investigated.]

"A lot of people are afraid for their jobs. They don't want repercussions coming down on their butts," he said.

Davis went immediately to Roger Cherewatti and told him what he heard and who he thinks said the slurs. "I said that I thought it was about time that this kind of thing be put to a halt. When he asked me 'What would I do?' I said I would suspend him."

Davis had been sitting in the dispatchers office with two other workers when the broadcast was made. He said he and the other men identified the culprit by his voice. Davis has worked at the plant for more than 21 years.

Chancellor Joseph Duffey said he could not comment on the investigation at this time.

The remarks come at a time when the University is gearing up for a week of racial awareness events that will culminate on Civility Day, Oct. 27. The week commemorates the Southwest Residential Area brawl two years ago.

The programming is in line with the recommendations set by Judge Frederick Hurst of the Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination. Hurst judged the brawl to be racially motivated.

Cop car found in space

By THOMAS RODRIGUES
Collegian Staff

Parking violations are a major source of revenue at the University of Massachusetts and even the basis of a Parking Scholarship Fund, but the violators are not always students or their visitors.

The Collegian received a letter yesterday complaining about a parking violation involving a handicapped spot in lot 42 near the Sylvan Residential Area.

The letter was from two Sylvan residents whose fathers are confined to wheelchairs and who say they become outraged when they see someone using the parking spots designated for handicapped persons for reasons other than need.

Last Thursday these two men witnessed an incident they say shocked them: a police officer backing into a handicapped parking space.

"We tend to get upset at people who thoughtlessly park in a handicapped parking space when they do not need it. Now, it is bad enough when everyday citizens have the gall to use these spaces; imagine my surprise when I looked out my window and saw a university police car backing into one," said student Craig Jennings from Brown Residence Hall.

Along with a letter, Jennings sent the Collegian the accompanying photo that depicts the patrol car in violation of parking regulations.

An inspector at the Registry of Motor Vehicles in Northhampton said police have no special privileges, and unless the officer was on an emergency call he was violating the regulations.

The officer could not be reached to explain why he may have taken the time to back the car into the parking space during an emergency situation.

"Even if he is a police officer, he is not authorized to use those spots," said Paul R. Appleby, director of Handicapped Student Affairs.

Piccirillo relieved of SGA duties

Student Supreme Court justices Wednesday removed Student Government Association Clerk of Courts Paul Piccirillo from office because of charges that he is politically biased.

The statement of the justices read that Piccirillo: "(has displayed) incompetence in fulfillment of his duties as Clerk of Courts; lack of impartiality with regards to his duties as Clerk of Courts; disregard for the Court's public image, thereby hampering our effectiveness as a judicial body."

Seven justices voted unanimously for Piccirillo's removal. Under

Candidates spar in final debate

• High-stakes clash for both

By DONALD M. ROTHBERG
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES (AP) — George Bush pointed to arms control, defense and the death penalty last night to punctuate his campaign-long description of Michael Dukakis as a liberal. Dukakis, seeking a debate-night breakthrough, rejected labels in favor of a "vision of America" and portrayed Bush as an apostle of the status quo.

The two White House rivals also clashed over Social Security in their second and final debate of the race. Bush vowed he'd never cut the federal pension program, no matter what Dukakis said. The Democrat cited unsuccessful Reagan administration efforts to do just that, and said, "I'm sure you'll try to do it again."

Bush was looking to pad a lead in the public opinion polls as the two rivals met on the campus of UCLA. Dukakis went into the encounter looking for a breakthrough to turn the race in his favor in the final weeks.

On Social Security, the environment, and ethics in government, Dukakis said, "I don't know which George Bush I'm listening to" and accused him of shifting positions.

Dukakis said the campaign would turn on the issues if Bush would "get rid of the labels . . . Mr. Bush has used the label 'liberal' at least ten times."

Bush strongly defended his vice presidential running mate, Dan Quayle, and said "he could do the job" if tragedy thrust him into the Oval Office. Dukakis replied that Bush had said the selection would "tell all . . . and it sure did."

• Main issues missed

By RONN GARRY
Collegian Staff

Finally, after months of name-calling and opponent bashing, the two presidential hopefuls, Vice President George Bush and Gov. Michael Dukakis, earnestly attempted to plainly discuss the issues in last night's final presidential debate.

COMMENTARY

But what were the issues? There were so many superfluous questions such as "who are your heroes," "state what you like about your opponent," and "Mr. Bush, is your criticism of the governor too harsh," that the real issues were virtually ignored.

What we really need was Sergeant Joe Friday from Dragnet on the panel saying: "Just the facts men."

The second and final debate never covered the issues of the deficit, acid rain, educational proposals, or contra aid — among others — and it only briefly touched on such major issues as the agriculture, the environment, and Social Security programs.

The debate took on a feeling that the candidates were being questioned like: "bachelor number one, if you were to become president of the United States . . ."

Some of the issues that were covered were the death penalty, possible cuts of the military budgets, taxes, abortion, the Supreme Court, and Dan Quayle.

Mayor Andrew Young of Atlanta will speak during Civility Day, scheduled for Oct. 27, Chancellor Joseph Duffey announced at yesterday's Faculty Senate meeting.

Young, 56, was a top aide to the late Dr. Martin Luther King during the 1960's, served as ambassador to the United Nations during the Carter administration and was the first black person from Georgia elected to congress since reconstruction after the Civil War. North pole claim fake, data says

BALTIMORE (AP) — Newly uncovered notes kept by Robert E. Peary show the explorer claimed to be the first person to reach the North Pole even though he knew he hadn't come closer than 121 miles, an astronomer and historian says.

The new evidence indicates Peary knew exactly how far away he was and turned back when supplies ran low and warming weather threatened to make the floating ice too dangerous, Dennis Rawlins said in an interview yesterday.

Peary had been under pressure to publicly declare his 1909 expedition a success, said Rawlins, who uncovered a previously sealed file in the Johns Hopkins University library.

"My feeling is his reaction was he had to make the claim because he published a book in 1907 saying he got close and it didn't sell at all," Rawlins said.

"He had the task of hoaxing the world while under the harshest spotlight, all the while accusing his archrival (explorer Frederick A. Cook) of faking the very same attainment. The amazing thing is he had the the guts and the intelligence to pull it off."

Rawlins' findings, published Wednesday in the Washington Post, are the latest salvo in an 80-year geographical dispute over whether Peary was the first to reach the North Pole, and, if not, whether he knew how far off the mark he had been.

The Peary controversy erupted almost immediately after the explorer lodged his claim because he did not provide evidence, such as the records of his sextant readings, to show he had been at the pole.

A slip of paper with Peary's sextant readings and other navigational calculations, apparently written while he was at his northernmost point during the expedition, was suppressed by Peary and then was sealed and placed in the National archives along with his other papers many years after his death in 1920.

In 1984, Peary's descendants unsealed the papers, containing mostly numbers that remained undeciphered until Rawlins obtained them.

Peary's scrawled calculations, understandable only to someone familiar with navigations by the stars, show the explorer came no closer to the pole than 121 miles, according to Rawlins.

Iraqi says Virgin Mary drew marks on her

AMMAN, Jordan (AP) — Hundreds of people, some clutching rosaries, have been visiting a woman who says the cross-shaped marks that suddenly appeared on her body were drawn by the Virgin Mary.

Lina Karabashi, 18, said Wednesday she fasted for three days at Mary's request because she "promised me she will give me communion today."

The Iraqi woman said the Virgin Mary drew three crosses on her body Saturday as she rested at Hussein Medical City, where she underwent foot surgery Oct. 2. She has had 19 operations since her left foot was crushed in an accident when she was 6.

Scores of people visited Mrs Karabashi in her hospital room. Her Jordanian husban, Samiir, said hundreds have come to their home since her release Tuesday. Some brought rosary beads for her to bless.

Mrs. Karabashi said the Virgin Mary has visited her 10 times since Saturday and has had "long" conversations with her.

This is really amazing, terrifying," said Elham Azar, who visited her Wednesday at the stone-built house in the city's Jebel Webeh neighborhood.

Miss Azar, 30, said the crosses look real to me ... I am sure it is a miracle."

Japan ahead of US in information transfers

Research shows US stifles employee input

By YANA DLUGY
Collegian Staff

One of Japan's secrets to hi-tech success is that they can channel information from research to industry better than the United States, according to a senior staff associate at the National Science Foundation.

To an audience of 50 at Martson Hall yesterday, Robert Cutler presented data based on a nine-month study he conducted — in which he interviewed 55 Japanese and 51 US researchers — to determine how technologies developed at universities are channeled to industries.

"In Japan, it's difficult to move people, but it's easy to move ideas," Cutler said.

He said there is a great deal of trust between Japanese supervisors and their employees, and that employee input is welcomed.

But the United States, Cutler said, practices "management by objection," an attitude that stifles ideas from external sources.

"In such an environment," he said, "information neither travels fast nor to the right people at the right time."

Cutler said, the United States also suffers from a corner the market syndrome, whereas the Japanese companies are very liberal with exchanging information with each other.

"They [Japanese companies] are eager to please their customers and would rather have their people involved in making something better for the marketplace than trying to capture all of the profits from a new technology product," Cutler said.

This is partly because hi-tech Japan is "a small country," where presidents know each other and probably went to the same university at the same time, Cutler said.

"When one company starts something new, the president calls his friends to discuss it," he said.

Another factor in Japan's success is government involvement, according to Cutler.

"In Japan, the government acts as the organizer and coordinator of the private industrial sector," he said.

Burnt offerings intended to encourage prevention

By ERIN ABBEY
Collegian Staff

Charred relics from University fires lined the Environmental Health and Safety's Campus Center Concourse table yesterday in an effort to show that their precautions are relevant.

As part of a display to promote Fire Prevention Week, there was a pot that once had plastic bowls placed on it, but is now a blackened pot of hardened plastic folds, said Mike Swain, who works at EHS and is a lieutenant at the Greenfield Fire Department. Swain said the pot was left on a heated burner in a residence hall.

The most common cause of fire at the University is people cooking food in their rooms, he said.

Although EHS, an extension of Health Services, attracts the curious with their charcoal, their purpose is to teach people how to prevent fires, said Don Erickson, who also works at EHS and is a captain at the Amherst Fire Department.

Erickson said one national statistic says that everyone will be involved in a fire at least twice in their life.

"Most people will claim they're quite aware," he said. "But they're really not. I think they're over confident because they haven't been involved in one."

Most fires are caused by negligence such as not checking a room before you leave, he added.

For example, in Butterfield residence hall last year a just-turned-off hairdryer was laid on the carpet. The relic now has a piece of shag rug clinging to a melted nozzle.

About a dozen people at a time hovered around the table to see the films, relics, fire extinguishers, and to ask questions, Erickson said.

Some are fascinated by such items as the deformed, charred clock radio that a candle had melted on, he said.

Others take more heed in knowing how to prevent fires when they see the articles, he said.

But in stopping by the table, he said, "They might pick up tidbits on how to prevent fires."

Although it was the late 70's when UMass last saw a blazing fire in a residence hall, fire fighters keep busy with small fires, Erickson said.

Also keeping the fire fighters busy is an average of 200 false fire alarms made each year at UMass. Erickson said the University and courts are starting to be tougher on people making false alarms.

Only six fire fighters are on duty at a time at the Amherst fire department, Erickson said, and so false alarms deplete their resources available for a real fire.

Besides charcoaled pieces, the EHS also had five different kinds of fire extinguishers on display. The extinguishers were there, Swain said, to educate people on which one is best for a particular kind of fire.

A water fire extinguisher should never be used on an electrical fire, Swain said, noting that the extinguisher would only enhance the fire.

"That's the big problem. People do not know which one to use," he said. "We'd rather have everyone get out. You can replace a building but if you get hurt."

Alumni coordinator Gerry Grady

29 years later Grady still loves UMass

By SYLVIA GAUDETTE
Collegian Staff

Once upon a time, Gerry Grady fell in love with the University of Massachusetts.

Neither Grady nor UMass have been the same ever since.

Grady came to UMass in 1959 to work in the University's bureau of government research.

Three years later, he became business manager for the University, overseeing many different facets of UMass during its greatest period of growth, encompassing ten years work.

Grady was also in charge of the "extracurricular activity of handling our relationship with the town of Amherst."

Today he is coordinator of community and alumni relations for the University.

Grady is also a full-time cheerleader for the University. To his disappointment, though, he said "not enough people are as proud of this place as they should be."

"I ask students, 'Have you ever been to Sugarloaf? It's a beautiful view! Take your girlfriend!'" he said.

"College life for me was a full time activity, seven days a week," he said. "It was important to have a good time at parties, to go to concerts, to go to football games. Everyone assumed that it was part of the college experience."

Grady spends a lot of time trying to figure out what makes UMass students tick.

He said he wishes more students would take advantage of the great things at UMass, academic and extracurricular. He also wishes that he could "get students to do good things together."

Once upon a time, students in Grady's political science class said they wanted to go to Washington D.C. to see Congress in session.

At first the expense seemed exorbitant and most thought it would never be possible.

That was on a Wednesday.

Two days later, one of his students, coincidentally the president of the Student Government Association, said he'd raised $2,700 for the trip.

Looking back on the turn of events, Grady said he realized the trip was no longer a fantasy and became determined to make it a possibility. He said, "It won't be enough, but we're going to Washington." They decided to lobby for financial aid for needy students.

And Students Advocating Financial Aid (SAFA) was born.

Once upon a time, Grady played the trumpet in high school. His love for music carried him to a football game, and in turn to the "Power and class of New England," the University of Massachusetts Minuteman Marching Band. Now he's and honorary band member and a devoted roadee.

Grady is most animated when he talks about the marching band. In fact, he's travelling with the band to the University of Delaware next week. His wife thinks he's crazy for "wanting to sleep on a gym floor." To Grady it's heaven.

Now 67, Grady comes from the small town of Port Washington, Wis., where he was president of his high school student government, and played for the high school football team. He later attended Lawrence (Wis.) College, and after serving in the marines, earned a master's degree in political science from the University of Chicago.

Rabbi promotes international exchange

By BRAIN PURCELL
Collegian Correspondent

"Finding your roots" appears to be a common desire at the University of Massachusetts, and while some students have had this opportunity through the International Exchange Program, others have simply travelled to where their ancestors lived.

Rabbi Saul Perlmutter, now in his 15th year as director of the UMass B'nai B'rith Hillel Foundation, is encouraging all students to do just that.

He spent last year on sabbatical in Israel with his family, and said his travels gave him "a sense of relativism that you don't get when you grow up in one place."

He also mentioned that being away from the United States for such a long time broadened his horizons about the world.

Perlmutter said "the problems between the Palestinians and the Israelis are very complex and too deeply rooted for an easy solution."

"Both sides need to recognize the legitimacy of the other," he added.

He said he has found that most people in Israel are leading normal lives. He added that the media has given us an image of "firebombs, rocks and violence," but excluding the outskirts of the country, that image is not representative of Israel.

Students who are interested in visiting Israel should consider visiting Hillel first, Perlmutter said. A two-week tour of the country during intersession will be led by Yehudit Heller, program director for the Hillel. Heller was born in Israel.

Perlmutter said that there is a fairly large alumni network living in Israel and that they have extended an invitation to help students who wish to visit the country.

For more information on trips to Israel or related questions, Perlmutter said students should visit the UMass Hillel office, in room 302 of the Student Union Building.

Federal agents begin roundup of violent Jamaican drug gangs

MIAMI (AP) — Federal agents have begun a nationwide roundup of violent Jamacian drug gangs blamed for 1,400 murders over the past 3½ years and 121 people already have been arrested, authorities here and in Washington said yesterday.

US Attorney General Dick Thornburgh said the Jamaican gangs, called posses, are "among the largest traffickers in crack cocaine."

The posses "have staked out a large piece of the nation's drug and firearms trafficking," Thornburgh said.

Thornburgh told a Washington news conference, and are allegedly involved in kidnapping, in robberies, assaults, domestic and international gun trafficking, money laundering and fraud.

The arrests began Wednesday night and cover 20 states, but were focused in Houston, Miami and New York said Stephen Higgens, director of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobbacco and Firearms.

The gangs are estimated to have 10,000 members nation wide, he said.

Thirty-four people alleged to be members of the Shower Posse were named in an indictment unsealed today in Miami, said the US Attorney Dexter Lehtinen.

More than 400 other suspects form 40 posses were being sought Lehtinen said.

The Miami indictment accuses the suspects of smuggling cocaine and marijuana from the Bahamas and distributing the drugs in suitcases to New York, Los Angeles, Detroit and other locations

It also charges them with buying weapons in Dayton, Ohio, and trying to bribe witnesses in New York to protect the posses from investigation.

The charges include conspiracy to distibute drugs, racketeering, conspiracy to export drugs, making false statements to buy firearms and illegally transporting firearms.

There are no federal murder charges, but among the racketeering acts are accusations that various posse members participated in nine murders during 1984 and 1985, including six in Miami, two in Los Angeles and one in the Bronx.

Higgens said that was only a fraction of the posses' estimated 1,400 killings around the country since January 1985.

The posses grew out of gangs in the slums of Jamacia that have carried their activities and their bloody feuds to the streets of the United States in an effort to expand their control of drug trafficking.

ALGERIA REVOLT — Two Algerian soldiers stand on their tank in the capital Algiers yesterday. The tank is one of the few remaining in the streets after a week of bloody riots largely over rising food prices.

Fall brings changes to region

BOSTON (AP) — Leaf blizzards, puffy pets, overhead formations and mad dashes to the closet are all signs that October's chill is becoming established. Even planet earth and its atmosphere are getting in step with the feel of fall.

Rakes, blowers, bags and calluses will be commonplace in the coming weeks as what shaded us during summer jades us now. It used to drive you nuts. Now it might drive you condo. Hopefully, the family pet will fit in.

Rover is rather robust this time of year, adding fat and thicker fur for a winter coat. You might follow suit in spite of our thin frenzy. Your metabolism is speeding up, producing more body heat and demanding more food to stoke the furnance. For many of us that translates into a too enthusiastic gut reaction. Opening the belt one notch solves it.

You can find that position really fast these days as you fly into your clothes trying to hide from the morning chill. Is there a more difficult jouney than the dreaded daily route from beneath warm covers to the suit of the day?

Maybe there is, and it could be overhead. There, flocks of geese are headed south. They fly in V formations behind leaders who rotate into and out of the front, wind-breaking position. Geese trailing off on either side of the V ride on an invisible wake created by the leader.

It's like surfing on a motorboat wake and helps conserve energy on the trip.

Hawks and many other species of birds often utilize autumn winds in their migrations too.

Fall is a time of increased atmospheric agitation. Stronger storms are moving closer as colder Canadian air sinks into the United States and blasts eastward. Excellent tailwinds ensue. They also blow up and over mountains lofting hitchiking hawks to great altitudes from which they can cruise tens of miles on their huge, outstretched wings.

Scientists have noticed something else that changes with the onset of the cold season. It encompasses the entire northern hemisphere. It's related to the Greenhouse Effect. It's a seasonal fluctuation of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere carbon loads increase. It's been measured.

At far northern locales where the effect is most pronounced, an added 35 billion tons of carbon collects in the air during winter.

At Florida latitudes where more greenery persists year round, atmospheric carbon fluctuates less radically but still tallies a 15 billion ton difference between winter high and summer low.

From toilets to textbooks to tofu, UMass auxiliary services is able to handle it all

By ANTHONY PADOVANO
Collegian Staff

What do the Dining Commons and the toilets in Campus Center have in common?.

They are both run by Auxiliary Services.

Ashoke Ganguli

Just about everything students eat, drink, read and sit on at the University of Massachusetts is at least indirectly handled by Auxiliary Services.

Auxiliary Services is the largest service organization on campus, annually spending more than $29 million on services.

The departments in Auxiliary Services are: the University Store; 10, 14, and 19 meal plans; Accommodations; Food Services; Conference Services; Building Services; Financial Services; Personnel; and Retail Services.

These departments in turn run all of the dining commons, the Textbook Annex, the University Store, all of the vending machines in the Campus Center and the dormitories, the bathrooms and everything else in the Campus Center complex, the Hatch and "Everything else that housing doesn't cover," said Ashoke Ganguli, executive director of Auxiliary Services.

The $29,738,466 Auxiliary Services spent in 1987 is completely self-generated, the largest portion coming from board plan collections.

In 1987, the 10, 14 and 19 meal-plans accounted for $13,570,654, or 45 percent, of the total Auxiliary Services budget. The University Store, which grossed $9,936,483 in revenues in 1987 and is projected to bring in $10,148,000 this year, is the next largest chunk in the budget.

All of the money made by each department is funneled into the Auxiliary Executive Trust Fund and then redistributed

One of the biggest complaints most students have about attending school is indirectly directed at Ganguli and Auxiliary Services: the price of textbooks.

But according to Ganguli, "We are basically a non-profit organization." He said the Annex tacks on 15 percent to the base cost of the book to pay for rent, utilities, wages and all other incidental costs of running the operation, whereas most other bookstores add 20 percent to the base cost.

As far as the prices for used books go, Ganguli said there is a national used book price list that is used as a guideline. There is a small handling fee tacked on.

"When excess funds are generated, they are put into a payment replacement fund," which goes towards replacing rugs, tables, chairs, as well as repair on the buildings Auxiliary Services is responsible for, he said.

The repair and upkeep of buildings is the biggest challenge facing Auxiliary Services, said Ganguli. "All of our buildings are turning 20 years old this year, and at 20 years all the roofs are starting to fall apart."

He said $200,000 worth of repairs will be done to the roof of the Top of the Campus Bar.

Ganguli, who has been in Auxiliary Services for 10 years and the executive director for the past eight, said he loves the job. "The best part of my job is working with students. No amount of money can beat that."

■ Debate

The high-stakes debate 26 days before the election blended political hardball with poignant moments when first Bush, then Dukakis, recalled the death of their own children, many years ago.

Bush said that as president he would have no conservative litmus test for Supreme Court justices, and wouldn't choose judges who would try to legislate from the bench. He then noted that Dukakis once called himself a "progressive liberal Democrat" in order to get primary votes. He said President Reagan had made outstanding Supreme Court appointments.

Said Dukakis: "If the vice president . . . thinks that Robert Bork was an outstanding appointment that is a very good reason for voting for Mike Dukakis on the 8th of November." Bork's controversial nomination was defeated by the Senate.

Dukakis said he has appointed 130 judges in Massachusetts based on ability and not because they are liberal or conservative. Bush has never appointed a judge, he noted.

Neither man refrained from speaking directly to his rival, even though the ground rules supposedly left no room for it.

Bush said Dukakis had raided Massachusetts state pension funds to balance the budget, and Dukakis shot back, "You're dead wrong, George."

Bush used his closing statement to stress his Republican National Convention vision of a "kinder, gentler nation."

Folks here are still talking about "The 1952 Incident." For some reason still unknown, a certain graduating class at a certain university missed what was certainly the opportunity of a lifetime.

The chance to meet with a recruiter from the National Security Agency.

Maybe they were busy that day. Maybe something else caught their eye. But the fact remains, a meeting with NSA could have meant a future full of challenging, exciting projects.

Now you've got the same chance. Our recruiter will be visiting campus soon in search of talented mathematicians, computer scientists, electrical engineers and linguists. We're looking for people who want to work on important hands-on assignments, right from the start.

NSA is the agency responsible for producing foreign intelligence information, safeguarding our government's communications and securing computer systems for the Department of Defense.

And we're equally committed to helping you make your future strong. So do yourself a favor and meet with us. You don't need 3-D glasses to see that it's a great opportunity.

NSA will be on campus November 1 interviewing seniors majoring in Electrical Engineering, Computer Science, Math and Language.

Some advice for Mike and George

He's no Jack Kennedy

There are very few times when I would write about the same subject two weeks in a row.

But there are exceptions.

Dan Quayle is a joke. I seriously believe that the man is incapable of being vice-president. I'm not trying to lambaste him unnecessarily, but if the Bush-Quayle ticket wins next month, the United States will accept the Dan Quayle mentality.

Or should I say the Dan Quayle "advisor" mentality?

David R. Mark

What does it say for the United States when the expectation level for a man trying to hold the second most important spot in US government is that he doesn't drool? We should be expecting the man to be "the next Jack Kennedy." We should expect the best from the people who are asking to lead our country, not that they are merely walking upright.

What was going through George Bush's mind when he selected Dan Quayle? He couldn't conceivably thought the man was an asset to the ticket. He's not the best 40ish candidate. There are far better candidates who are young or reasonably young, such as Govs. Thompson (Illinois) or Kean (New Jersey) or Sens. Danforth (Missouri) or Symms (Idaho). None are older than a youthful 54, all have good public records, and all are good speakers.

The best candidates for the number two position are older. People like Sens. Domenici (New Mexico) and Dole (Kansas) probably were the strongest candidates.

Bush wanted young, though, so Bush took Quayle.

But there's more to Quayle than just youth.

David B. Wilson of the Boston Globe hit the nail on the head when he wrote earlier this week about the differences between JFK and Dan Quayle.

"When Kennedy ran for president, he had served in the Congress two years longer than Quayle has today. That's not much of a difference, relatively speaking.

"However . . . when JFK ran for president, he held the Pulitzer Prize for his book Profiles in Courage. He was a graduate of Harvard College, as his father had been, not Depauw University. He had spent quite a lot of his childhood in the US Embassy residence in London, where his father was ambassador. He had attended the London School of Economics and had been tutored by Harold Laski . . . And Jack Kennedy was four-year Navy combat veteran of World War II, a PT boat commander who was an authentic, decorated-for-valor hero, and a very sophisticated human being."

Dan Quayle is none of that. Dan Quayle is a programmable, error-prone Senator who would be an embarrassment to the world if he were to become vice president.

What's more, Dan Quayle's advisors, by suggesting the expectation for his debate was just above speaking in complete sentences, have set a dangerous example to the youth of this country — supposedly the people Quayle can reach out to.

If Dan Quayle can be that much of a joke and still be considered vice-presidential material, then does that mean American students should strive for mediocrity? Should factory-workers? Scientists?

Jack Kennedy would be ashamed.

David R. Mark is editorial editor of the Collegian

The great debate?

Notes from the Campus Center Basement

A drunken door mix-up

Best police log item from the semester (so far): Sept. 30, 5:48 a.m. — "Suspicious person in Webster Dorm. Party walked into wrong room by error. He stated he had been drinking and was confused as all the doors look alike."

Nancy Klingener

One of those mysteries of UMass life: Why the women's bathroom in Morrill Science Center has a toilet clearly designed for men. Oh, the bathroom was converted? It's been a women's room for at least 15 years, so maybe they could get around to replacing it, or even ripping the damn thing out. Instead, it is kept cleaned and even stocked with toilet paper. Oh, the logic.

* * *

Business majors beware. I hope none of you planned on owning your own business someday, and keeping that old free market competitive. This week, Donald Trump bought the Eastern Shuttle from Texas Air, confirming my belief that by the time we are about 40 years old, all business in the country will be owned by Trump, Ted Turner and Rupert Murdoch. USA Today will be the only newspaper (and tv show) and we will all live in identical prefabricated ranch houses, which come in two halves and all you have to do is staple them together. (You can do that now — and the houses even come with furniture already inside.) It's a great country, though, for the spirit of ingenuity.

As we come to the mid-semester crunch, the best escape is right on campus. Productions of "Blues for Mr. Charlie," a play by the late, great writer (and sometime UMass faculty member) James Baldwin and of three one-act plays by Eugene O'Neill will play in the next week. Seeing fellow students on stage can be inspiring, as well as entertaining. And you can forget the damn history paper for a couple of hours.

* * *

Dan Quayle goes home after the vice-presidential debate, a little depressed. His wife, Marilyn, asks if there's anything she can do to make him feel better.

"How about a toss in the hay?" he asks, and she agrees.

After they've finished and Danny's smoking a cigarette or whatever, he turns to his wife. "How was I?" he says.

"Well," she says, "you're no Jack Kennedy."

I was going to balance this off with a Dukakis joke, but I can't think of any. The guy just isn't funny. So I called a friend who works in the Statehouse, and he didn't know any, either, which is downright scary. If the Duke wins, it could be a sober four years. How long can you harp on a big nose and little shoulders, anyway?

The SGA is nothing to joke about

Well, I finally did it. I finally activated myself and attended a UMass SGA meeting.

We've all heard about it; seventy or so students gather in a room, act like children, create utter chaos and then go home and add the word senator to their resumes. Something every student should drop on on and visit at least once in their collgiate career. That is what I came to see last evening. Though I wasn't disappointed (there was a show) I was surprised.

My first surprise was that not every senator behaved like a preschooler. In fact, seven out of eight of them appeared to have come to discouss issues that affect their portion of student life and to learn by listening to other senators about how they can make the campus environment more stimulating for the student body.

Unfortunately, the other students, representing the extreme right of the UMass political science program, could scare Dick Nixon into backing McGovern. These are the folks who are involved in a very serious training program that includes a course entitled "How to Put Down Everyone not Like Yourself and Still Smell Like Ward Cleaver." Senators, I grew up with Ward Cleaver. I knew Ward Cleaver. Senators, you're not Ward Cleaver.

My second surprise shouldn't have been a surprise at all. The leader of this gang of was Bill Collins. For those who don't know about Bill, he is what the scientific community defines as a Neo-maxi zundweeb-i. Nevertheless, Bill paced the isle at the meeting mumbling "This is a joke" under his breath. Bill, in case no one has told you yet, you don't have to attend any more of these "jokes."

Student government doesn't gave to be a joke. It can be the most active listening ear available to the student body. It can provide the student body with a voice, agumented by good old intellect, that communicate to anyone those things that concern us most. I challenge each member of the SGA to put down his/her petty differences with what's happening in the political arena outside of UMass, and actually get something positive done on behalf of the students at UMass.

The shame of rape

I wondered when it would start.

I talked about it with my friends over the summer; we all hoped this semester would be better. We tried to convince ourselves that this semester would be different. We couldn't.

The first month went by quickly and I forgot — until I picked up Tuesday's Collegian and read the article "Rape story disclosed by freshman victim".

While reading the article I wondered what could possibly drive a man to want to humiliate a woman like that. Is it that our egos are so big that we must physically dominate someone? I hope not.

When men rape, the woman is the primary victim, but we are all victims. When walking through the campus late at night, if I see a woman alone. can I offer to walk with her without horrifying her? Can women ever truly trust men?

"Susan," I'll never experience the pain and humiliation you must be enduring. I'll never truly understand how badly you hurt. I must plead with you not to condemn us all. For if you do, then I can never be part of a woman's life. I can't be a sensitive friend, willing to listen to all of her problems and fears. How could I, if I'm not trusted?

Comic strip mocks tragedy

I admit it. The Zero-Sum cartoon in Thursday's collegian my have really drawn a smile on our faces. However, let me tell you something beyond that. It was not just another cartoon. It was Picasso's Gurnika, the famous painting reminding the world of the German Condor Legion's bombing of that Basque village.

Being a Basque myself, I could not help feeling a bit ashamed when I saw such a serious war treated in a manner like that. I guess only a few people know about the reality of the paining. Since I not only know but deeply feel it, I am obiloged to let everyone know. Okay, so it's funny. But please, let's not forget the shameful meaning lying behind the painting.

Camper Van Beethoven to play Ballroom tonight

By AL ARPAD
Collegian Staff

Making the Blue Wall into a big, cement coffee house was a lame idea. It used to be a bar, and a popular one by all accounts. Tonight, anybody with an I.D. will once again have the chance to drink beer in a large, unattractive room with loud people; Camper Van Beethoven and Big Dipper will be playing the Student Union Ballroom at 8 p.m.

Camper Van Beethoven is from California, and they have a lively sense of humor, which sets them apart from most Boston bands. The weather is better in California, so I guess singing about debauchery and the putrifiction of the American dream is a more cheerful proposition there.

After several years of prolific near-success on the independent Rough Trade label, a spurious enterprise that had the group recording in places such as Chris Molla's Enormous-Piece-of-Squid-in-the-Fridge studios, Camper Van Beethoven released "Our Beloved Revolutionary Sweetheart" on the Virgin lable this summer. All of their records are good, and the leery, sneery vocals speak eloquent volumes to the post-Repo Man social deviant. Although the band subscribes to the uniquely boozy outlook of traditional American narco-romanticism, celebrating childish irrationality and premature dementia, the simple humanity and cutting insight of their biggest single to date " Take the Skinheads Bowling", is testimony to the sincerity that underlies the overlying undertones of the overall understanding of a band like Camper Van Beethoven.

Since I didn't know anything about the other band playing tonight, I called up three local radio stations. All three DJ's agreed that the band is from Boston, and they all played songs from Big Dipper records. Since I had all three stations on at the same time, I couldn't undrstand most of the words, but one guy told me the lyrics have "a nice blend of loudness and intelligence."

Like many two guitar bands, Big Dipper seems to rely heavily on complex harmonies and rhythmic variations, subordinated to a very heavy, driving beat. Camper Van Beethoven does all that, and also gives at least a passing nod to quaint musical conventions like melody and dynamics. Expect a lot of stomp-and-sweat dancing during both sets.

Tickets are $5.00 for UMass students, relatively inexpensive.

Anybody who wants a beer will probably have to stay in the Earthfoods room during the show. As I understand it, the Student Union Ballroom is normally a non-smoking area; maybe the campus police will set up a Ballroom Substation to monitor compliance with the University tobacco policy. That would be a riot.

Whatever else happens, the show will be cheap and loud; a great way to start your weekend.

Camper Van Beethoven plays the Student Union Ballroom tonight.

Due to computer difficulties beyond our control, LIVEWIRE will not appear this week. The Collegian regrets the untimely circumstances which led to the omission of this popular column. Thank you for bearing with us.

Fossey brought to life in Gorillas In the Mist

By JIM COLE
Collegian Staff

Dian Fossey was a spunky individual. Spending much of her life living alone in the mountains of Africa, devoted to the study and preservation of the mountain gorillas, she did much to change our understanding of the species and stop their extermination by poachers. It's not surprising that her story attracted interest in Hollywood, but as the project came together in late 1985, Fossey was murdered.

THE SCREENING ROOM

Despite that major setback, Gorillas in the Mist got made after all, and quite well, I might add. Effectively covering Fossey's adventures from start to sad finish, it begins as she arrives in Africa in 1967 and is told, to her surprise, by mentor Louis Leakey, that she'll be on her own. Unprepared and inexperienced, she relies on her native tracker and friend Sembagare, and after weeks of searching, makes contact. Her progress at gaining the gorilla's trust, and her breakthroughs with them, are the most intrguing parts of the film. It's no surprise, also, that many times the gorillas steal the show.

Yet Sigourney Weaver, in a part one dreams of, holds her own. She carries the film and paints a rich picture of a woman whose interest turns to obsession. Some setbacks she faces include brutal slaughtering "her" gorillas (some of these scenes are difficult to watch), and bureaucratic conflict with African officials, which over time start to change Fossey from eccentric to somewhat dangerous. Weaver subtly details this change convincingly, growing more vicious and frantic until she finally breaks down, weeping at how poachers don't just kill the animals, but remove their heads and hands to sell as ornaments.

There are, fortunately, lighter moments in the story. The appearance of a National Geographic photographer Bob Campbell (Bryan Brown of "FX"), shows that Fossey can be interested in her own species. Brown is good in his small role, but this element of the story, (and the part where three young students work with Dian and are horrified by her tactics), slowed the pace and even threw the film off balance somewhat. When we're with Weaver and the gorillas, the film shines.

Other actors are worthy of mention. John Omirah Miluwi, who plays Sembagare, is very good, especially since he's part of Kenya's mountain rescue team and had never acted before, and Julie Harris, as Fossey's friend Rosamund Carr, does a lot with a part that is too small for an actress of her caliber. Director Michael Apted, whose last film was Richard Pryor's Critical Condition, has done much better this time, telling a story that was not easy to adapt.

The real success of Gorillas in the Mist goes to Sigourney Weaver. Any doubts about her ability have been put to rest with this role. Not only does she deserve an Oscar nomination, but the statuette itself. No one deserves it more.

A few "big" fall films have arrived in the Valley. Punchline stars Sally Field and Tom Hanks as two opposites who both share an addiction to making people laugh. Field is the housewife who's not a good comic but a good person, and Hanks is the brilliant comic who's also unstable and something of a sleaze. Advance word on this flick is good. Word on Alien Nation, however, is the opposite. This

Max Roach brings diversity to a world of music

By JOHN SWANSON
Collegian Staff

Professor Max Roach has made himself scarce at the University of Massachusetts lately. But he has a pretty good excuse.

Roach, a part-time professor of music at the university, is considered one of the most talented and influential drummers of all time.

Last August, Roach received a $372,000 grant from the MacArthur Foundation. A foundation press release describes the grant as "no strings attached.":

PROFILE

"Recipients are free to use the awards as they wish. The MacArthur Foundation imposes no reporting requirements or restrictions on MacArthur Fellows."

In a musical career that has spanned nearly half a century, Roach has worked with top performers in jazz, classical, hip-hop and many experimental forms of music. Recently, while in Amherst, he took some time to talk about this career.

"I guess you might say I'm a guy who has drums and will travel. I believe that if you're involved, you take advantage of every opportunity. Don't put any kind of boundaries on yourself. I think the thing that all musicians have in common, no matter where in the world you go, is technique. If you're dedicated, disciplined and know what you're doing on your instrument, no matter what the area is, then you can fit into any kind of situation," he said.

Roach, whose soft, rough voice draws people into his world, has a handsome, worldly look about him.

Roach has already decided where the grant money will go. He hopes to open a school for underprivileged city youths.

"I'd like to build something that will give young people the opportunity . . . to deal with the kind of things that I had a chance to deal with, to have instruments available to them, good teachers," he said. Roach said he hopes to incorporate programs into the curriculum that would teach a wide variety of musical styles and "also have an area where you could teach unwed mothers, and people like that, computer techniques, so they could get a job," he said.

Roach was born in North Carolina on January 10, 1924. When he was four, his family moved to Brooklyn, New York, where Roach was exposed to the music of jazz greats like Duke Ellington, George Gershwin and Count Basie. He attended the Manhattan School of Music and the New England Conservatory of Music. From 1944 to 1945 Roach spent a year on the road with the Benny Carter Orchestra. He then gained national recognition while playing with saxophonist Charlie Parker in the late 1940s. After that, he played with many of the most popular names in jazz; Charles Mingus, Clifford Brown, Bud Powell, Thelonious Monk and even Ellington were among his collaborators. Roach took part in the 1949 Paris Jazz Festival, the 1958 Monterey Jazz Festival and the 1972 Newport Jazz Festival. In 1954, he was voted the greatest jazz drummer in history by 100 of his colleagues. In 1956, he received the Best Record of the Year award from Down Beat magazine.

In the 1960s, after the bebop era ended, jazz became more radical with Ornette Coleman's free-form style and Miles Davis' jazz-rock fusion. Although he had worked with Davis, Roach did not take part in the fusion movement. Today Roach commends Davis' efforts to remain at the musical forefront:

"He has managed to introduce new concepts. Now, in heavy metal and rock, I hear Miles Davis . . . He's been able to not only survive it, but to come up with new ideas that introduce new things to each new phase of the music's evolution," he said.

M'Boom, a jazz ensemble consisting of eight percussionists, was Roach's primary project in the early 1970s. The group has kept Roach on the experimental edge of jazz.

With hundreds of recordings to his name, Roach grew weary of the recording industry's "plantation mentality." In 1973, he came to the university as a professor of jazz and Afro-American music. Here he taught full-time until 1978, when CBS records offered him a recording contract. Since then, he has maintained a semi-sabbatical schedule at the university, lecturing or playing here two or three times each semester.

Roach has continued to perform with a wide variety of artists from all perts of the musical spectrum: the Boston Pops, Kronos Quartet, Japan's Koto Drummers and hip-hop artist Fab Five Freddie are some of his recent partners. He has scored several plays by Sam Shepard, including "Angel City" and "Suicide in B Flat." His hatred for racial tension in the United States and South Africa inspired is "Freedom Now Suite."

Roach has been twice married and twice divorced. He has two children.

Even though he hasn't taught in a decade, Roach still feels it is important to make young people realize their potential.

"After four years when a student finishes here at UMass, he can play John Coltrane's "Giant Steps" and just rip it apart . . . To start from that point and learn that much about improvisation is really a rush. It's very very gratifying," he said.

intriguing premise of an alien population living alongside us in L.A. falls flat when the teaming of alien Mandy Patinkin and human James Caan turns into another buddy-buddy cop movie. All the possibilities of the alien culture and differences from us are wasted in favor of a drug related underground. A pity.

The art theaters in Northampton are offering some interesting fare. A World Apart, starring Barbara Hershey as a mother fighting apartheid in 1963 South Africa has gotten rave reviews. It's playing at the Academy of Music. At the Pleasant Street, a film I said would never make it here, has. The Wizard of Loneliness is playing next week, and though reviews have been mixed, it looks like a nice little "slice of life" type film. For those interested, check it out.

Out of the thirteen cuts, three are worth mentioning: "Tip of my Tongue","Water", and "She's King". These songs have more of a pop flare along with the laid-back image of the rest of the album.

"She's King" is definitely the best track on the album; it probably could have been featured on the new Church album. The rest aren't worth my time or yours.

The only redeeming value this record has to offer is Marty Wilson-Piper's lyrics. Piper proves why he is one of the Church's songwriters. All the songs have great poetic quality; too bad he can't be a one-man band. Marty, my advice—stick with the Church, they're going places.

Bobs charm Iron Horse crowd

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

You can't really dance at a Bobs concert, or sing along to the twisted acapella offerings of this ever original quartet. The crowd that nestled into the cozy Iron Horse Cafe in Northampton for Tuesday evening's late show spent most of the night just grinning.

The Bobs are perpetually on tour (though there are no known "Bobs-heads" following their every move), and have seen Maine, Italy, and Florida since visiting the region last spring. The quartet has also spent some time in the recording studio, and it was the new creations off their soon to be officially released third albumn (entitled "Songs for Tomorrow Morning") that sparked the most smiles on Tuesday evening.

In "Santa Ana Woman" Matthew "Bob" Stull sang longingly about his passionate affair with a mysterious woman who mistakenly hires the detective-like Bob to find her long lost Uncle Gunnar "Bob" Madsen wore two holes through his blue jeans slapping out a back up rythm. "Signs on the Line" showcased Janie "Bob" Scott's strong voice and comic persona.

The most memorable tune of the evening, however, was delivered by bespectacled baritone Richard "Bob" Greene, by far the lowest Bob on the vocal totem pole. "Pounded on a Rock" was presented as a lover's lament, as Greene assumed the role of an over-indulged partner to an amorous wife, who has built up her appetite and biceps washing clothes the old fashioned way.

"I love that woman," sang Greene, "with arms of iron and steel/ but when she wraps those arms around me/ it's mixed emotions that I feel"

Stull re-assumed the lead microphone to deliver a beg for the attention of a spouse who is much more interested in remaining "politically correct." "Please Let Me Be Your Third World Country" revolved around a staccato list of demands at the end of the song, as Stull cried "I have 70,000 thousand signatures demanding you go home with me tonight."

The Bobs could be excused for appearing a bit frazzled as the night grew old; besides a touring routine that could qualify the band for the White House, they had just returned from an MTV recording session in New York.

Contrabassist Salvatore Macchia will interpret Italian Bel Canto and Third Stream music in the continuing Faculty Series concerts on Sunday Oct. 16 in Bezanson Recital Hall at 8 p.m.

New biotechnology programs "breeds" life into UMass

By WILLIAM A. LORENZEN
Collegian Correspondent

"Biotechnology is not about creating Frankenstein monsters and chickens with four legs, and as for unnatural life, I don't think it could be done," said R. Glenn Brown, director of the new Biotechnology program at the University of Massachusetts.

Biotechnology is essentially the insertion of genetic material from one individual plant or animal into another through means controlled by human beings, Brown said. Research in the area began about 25 years ago, although the term "biotechnology" was coined only a decade ago.

Through this advanced biological technique, answers to specific problems may be solved with a higher rate of selection as well as greater speed and efficiency. In farm animals such as sheep and cattle, a variety of desirable traits may be combined in one animal while avoiding negative traits which may manifest themselves in a normal selection breeding process, Brown said.

"When we speak of breeding selection we are talking about decades. Biotechnology can produce positive results within terms of years," Brown said.

Brown is the former chairman of Food Science and Nutrition and has a ten year background in animal science from a position held at the University of Guelph, Ontario.

Executive Vice Chancellor and Provost Richard O'Brien said the new program will be the leading institution of its kind in New England.

"Along with Brown's appointment goes a substantial University investment in new equipment and laboratory space. It is, however, small and specialized compared to some of the programs at land grant Universities such as Cornell, Rutgers, and Penn State," O'Brien said.

The program has been allocated $1.7 million in addition to ordinary support costs for professors, he said. $1 million will be used to erect a biotechnology laboratory building near Morrill Science Center. The remaining $700,000 will be invested in analytical equipment.

"No new professors have been hired," said O'Brien. The program is being conducted because of an interest already shared by some UMass faculty.

Brown, in his new assignment, will coordinate biotechnological efforts between several departments, including: Food Science and Nutrition, Food Engineering, Veterinary and Animal Science, Biochemistry, Microbiology and Chemical Engineering. However, at this time there is no established educational biotechnology program. Students interested in the field will be working on biotechnological research through the Department of Molecular and Cellular Biology.

"It may take several years to actually get an academic department under way," Brown said.

The development of highly specialized antibodies will also play an important role in human health, stated Brown. Antibodies can be prepared to seek out and destroy harmful micro-organisms while having no effect on micro-organisms the body needs to maintain for ordinary biological functions.

Biotechnology at the University is engaged in the struggle against AIDS as well. Rabbits, which are normally immune to the HIV virus, are injected with genetic material which causes them to be susceptible to the development of a strain of AIDS almost identical to that in humans. The AIDS of Health in Bethesda, Maryland where they are infected with the disease in order to study the early development of the virus.

Brown says that he doesn't foresee any objections to the biotechnology program which is structured along federal, state and local guidelines.

Winning football roots explained

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

In the early winter of 1930, Charles McGoech joined the unemployment lines. As head coach of the Massachusetts Agricultural College football team in the fall of that year, McGoech had produced one lone victory, and suffered eight defeats.

The autumn winds of 1931 brought change; "Mass. Aggie College" was rechristened as Massachusetts State College, work was completed on the Curry S. Hicks Physical Education Building (built for a staggering $287,500), and young Melvin Taube was hired from Marion High in Indiana to rebuild the football program. At the age of 26, Taube inherited a sorry offensive line and a lightweight backfield, though the team did have a notorious sense of humor (Captains "Tuffy" Sylvester and "Ossie" Holmberg were born clowns, described one observer).

And sophomore Lou Bush, a 141 pound halfback from Turners Falls Ma., did appear to have potential. In the first game of the season, Mass. State shocked Cooper Union 50-0, as Bush broke free three times for touchdowns. Starting in Taube's radically different offensive set, modeled after Knute Rockne's experiments with national champion Notre Dame, Bush's 'potential' had quickly became reality. Bush added three more touchdowns in a 32-6 trouncing of Bowdoin college in the second week of the season, three more in a romp over Middlebury . . . Worcester Tech finally shut out the phenominal halfback on the fourth week of the season.

Against arch rival Amherst on the fifth week of this suddenly remarkable fall, Bush won the game with a 65-yard punt return touchdown in the third quarter as 7,500 fans witnessed the first Massachusetts defeat of its crosstown their decision, he has 24 hours to give his resignation and vacate the office.

"I'd like to stress that this was a group decision, there were no political motives involved," said Kathy White, spokesperson for the justices. "He has not exercised good judgment in his role as clerk of courts. There are quite a few incidents of him being partisan," she said.

Piccirillo could not be reached for comment. Justices said he had been asked to attend the meeting but declined.

Under the SGA Constitution, only the justices, by a majority can vote, remove the clerk. Justices are appointed by the residential areas and the Third World Caucus. When full, the Student Supreme Court has 19 justices. Currently there are only 10, according to Justice Adam Scales.

Because there is not a full slate of judges, the removal may not be binding, according to the constitution. Justices contacted said the removal is binding.

Scales said the removal is binding because a majority of the justices appointed had voted for the removal.

Justice Anne Buechler agreed. "It was a unanimous majority of the justices that were able to vote," she said. "It's legal and official."

This removal comes on the heels of Piccirillo's announcement that a court date has been set to decide the question of whether SGA Co-presidents-elect Shari Silkoff and Jason Rabinowitz can hold office. They were elected in March but have not taken office because of problems with the SGA Constitution and its bylaws.

Silkoff would not speculate on whether this would eventually lead to the approval of her and Rabinowitz as presidents. She was happy about Piccirillo's removal, however. "When someone so blatantly shows a bias . . . there's a problem. Hopefully we'll be able to work together now.

A cheer erupted from the SGA office when members of the SGA learned that Piccirillo had been removed. Piccirillo has drawn criticism from members of the SGA, and there had been a proposal, which was never voted on, asking for his resignation.

foes in seven years. The Gymnasts of Springfield College eventually snapped State's five-game winning streak with a 21-3 effort, but Taube's squad retaliated with a 77-0 humiliation of Wagner the following Saturday. "Easy" Lou Bush scored five touchdowns.

State finished 7-1-1 in Taube's inaugural campaign, and Bush led the nation in scoring with 20 touchdowns. Gone were the days of the lowly Mass Aggies — Massachusetts State football had entered the modern age.

Or in Bush's own words, uttered some 50 years later, "I wish to commemorate the lasting influence of three-sport coach Mel Taube and the fighting spirit of the sons of Massachusetts. 'Taube put State on the map.'"

■ Gerry Grady

Fifty years after playing high school football, Grady considers himself one of UMass' biggest football fans.

Grady said the team and the band are two good examples of extracurricular oppurtunities that reinforce a sense of community and fun that can be enjoyed not only by the organizations' members but the spectators as well.

Once upon a time, Grady spent a great deal of time planning an event for the community and UMass students. It was a lot of hard work, he said, and after the event was over, he was asked why he worked so hard on such a small event.

"Because 88 people were happy for two hours," he said.

If Grady succeeds in all his goals, he'll make about 25,000 other people happy as well.

■ Presidential Debate Analysis

Bush defended the death penalty, a strong military, lower taxes, pro-life, and, of course, Quayle's qualifications. While Dukakis didn't support the death penalty, debated Bush on taxes and the military, and criticized Bush's selection of Quayle.

There weren't any surprises in platforms, the candidates each reiterated themes they have used continuously. Although each one did move their views slightly to the middle. Bush, perhaps, was trying to lure in some more of the Reagan-Democrats, while Dukakis tried to cast away his left-of-center image and continue to gain some political ground.

In probably the best (and few) quips of the night, Dukakis tried shedding his liberal image by saying "If I had a dollar, George, for every time you used the word liberal, I'd qualify for one of those tax breaks you advocate for the rich."

Bush, in a sharp contrast to recent weeks, was remarkably cordial to the governor, intermittently agreeing with Dukakis on such issues as family issues, values, and dealing with federal violations of ethics law.

The remarks frequently drew the response from Dukakis that "I don't know which George Bush I'm seeing tonight."

Clearly, both candidates shied away from the political bashing both have employed on the campaign trail recently. The debate lacked the cliched, prepared verbal jabs that marked the previous confrontation.

If there was any "winner" (and that word should be used loosely), a slight nod would have to go to Bush, although only by the very slightest of margins.

He did a better job of answering the question closer to the way it was posed. He didn't gaffe as muny had expected the vice president might if pressed in a live debate, and, most important, recent polls have shown it is his race to lose.

Ruling withholds driver's name

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. (AP) — A judge today upheld a defense attorney's refusal to identify his client, the driver in a fatal hit-and-run accident. The victim's parents had gone to court seeking the man's name.

"The plaintiff's case has tremendous emotional appeal and it is difficult to rule against the plaintiffs," said Circuit Judge Timothy Poulton. "But I am convinced the law requires it."

He denied a motion by the parents of Mark Baltes, whose body was dragged 60 feet when it was struck by a white Buick after midnight on March 9, 1986. Defense attorney Barry Krischer has shielded his client's identity for more than 2½ years.

The parents' attorney immediately said he would appeal.

"This is not a 'we won-you lost' situation. This preserves the attorney-client relationship in Florida," Krischer said.

Both sides have predicted in higher courts because of the question of whether civil responsibility supercedes the attorney-client privilege.

The unusual struggle began the day after the accident when the driver asked Krischer if he would initiate a plea-bargain arrangement without revealing the client's name to authorities.

Detectives, using car fragments at the scene and paint chips found on Baltes' skull, theorized the vehicle was a 1984 or 1985 white Buick Riviera. But hundreds of police interviews and a reward failed to yield any firm suspects.

Krischer, in an attempt to block pressure to disclose the name, retained an attorney, Scott Richardson. Richardson, opened talks with prosecutors but did not divulge Krischer's link to the case. He never learned the name of the driver.

"Krischer eventually came forward, but refused to identify his client.

An attorney for Baltes' parents, who filed a $16 million wrongful death civil suit against the unknown driver in February, contends the attorney-client privilege does not permit lawyers to withhold vital information during criminal investigation.

dent Government Association, made a special appearance at the meeting to promote Civility Day. He encouraged the faculty to discuss the day with students in the classroom and informed them of a Civility Day event called "Hands Across UMass."

Organizers of the event hope to form a human chain of students stretching from Southwest to Sylvan.

In other business, the senators unanimously passed two motions: One motion creates minors in Environmental Design, and Leisure Studies and Resources. The other approved 22 appointments to 13 different faculty committees on campus.

■ Police cars

"We are so limited on the spaces that we have. We don't need those guys taking them," said an employee at Handicapped Student Affairs.

A check of the readily visible license plate with the duty log at the police station in Dickinson Hall showed the car had not been logged out to any regular patrol officers. This means, according to the desk clerk on duty, the car was being used by either a sergeant or a lieutenant, neither of whom have to sign a car out to use it.

Since it is Department of Public Safety policy not to reveal an individual officer's name to the public, the driver could not be identified.

Executive Director of Public Safety Arthur Hilson was unavailable for comment yesterday.

"I realize that this incident is not of colossal importance, but the idea tends to be; When you reprsent another organization's ideals and aspirations, try to conduct yourself accordingly, so that you don't make an ass of yourself, like this person has," Jennings said.

■ field hockey pummels Fairfield

Dartmouth, who UMass will play on Tuesday, and the University of New Hampshire, who the Minutewomen will play on Saturday, certainly did not see a competitive game.

The Stags failed to fire one shot at UMass senior goalie Cindy Cox in the first half or UMass senior goalie Sue Desmond in the second half.

In the meantime, the Minutewomen were peppering Fairfield goalies Karen Merchant in the first half for 19 shots and Pam Murray in the second for 16 shots.

Tonia Kennedy started the fireworks 15:15 into the first half with her team-leading 11th goal of the year to put UMass up 1-0.

The penalty corner was a major problem for the Stags as they could not draw one in the Minutewomen's end while UMass picked up 22 in the game.

Senior sweeper Julie Stuart was the direct beneficiary of those fouls by the Stags, scoring the next two goals of the game off slap shots from the top of the circle. Senior co-captain Ruth Vasapolli hit Stuart with the inbound pass of the corners at 23:35 and 26:18 of the first to give UMass a commanding 3-0 lead that it carried into halftime.

With UMass gaining a 4-0 lead at the beginning of the first half when Vasapolli, assisted by co-captain Pam Bustin, scored, Hixon started to empty her bench.

Junior Mara Frattasio, coming off the pine, beat Murray at 23:35 of the second half to give UMass a 5-0 lead. Senior Kathy Derwin assisted on the play.

Junior midfielder Bernadette Martel scored the next two goals of the game, her second and third, at 27:07 and 27:43. Derwin assisted on Martel's second goal to give UMass a 7-0 lead.

Frattasio finished things up for the Minutewomen by scoring at 34:05 to give UMass a 8-0 lead, its highest output in goals of the season.

Tomorrow's battle with New Hampshire should be an interesting game for the Minutewomen. Last season UMass played the Wildcats in the opening game of the NCAA playoffs at New Hampshire, where the Wildcats had not lost a game in 1987 and edged UNH 1-0 in front to advance to the regional championships and eventually the Final Four.

"You just have to take each team as they come," Hixon said. "And we'll have to play well down the stretch. We have to continue to be aggressive and excited about playing, regardless of who our opponents are. They have to be faceless kind of people."

■ volleyball to host A-10 matches

Last year, WVU crushed the Minutewomen in West Virginia, but Ford said she doesn't know what to expect from the Lady Mountaineers.

"I really haven't received anything on them. We just have to play our game. Juliet [Primer] has to attack out of the middle, Barbara Meehan has to attack out of the middle, and we have to put up a strong block," Ford said. "We have to attack up the middle first, if we're not going to do that, we'll have a difficult time beating them."

That strategy will be repeated against Duquesne the following day, Ford said.

"We won't do anything different," against the Duchesses, who were 2-6 before this week, Ford said.

"I don't want to take them lightly either. I'm looking foward to this weekend, Duquesne is a good, young team."

This weekend's games mark the half-way point of the volleyball season, and thus far, the 11-2 Minutewomen have met all expectations.

"Given our schedule and personnel on the team, we've done what we should have done. We've beaten the teams we should have beaten and we've had some great comebacks," Ford said. "I'm a little disappointed in the way we played against George Washington and Penn State."

"I want to see more improvement. I don't want to wait until the end of the season and say 'it's all coming together,' I want to see it now."

Experience and balance have been the keys in the first half of the season for UMass.

"We really need everyone to play well to win matches. If someone has an off-day, it will be tough to beat the good teams," Ford said.

"It could be a real special season for the seniors if they work hard."

Men's soccer to host Northeastern tomorrow

Minutemen try to rebound from tough loss

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts seniors Mike McCormick, Bret Blanton, Mike Mugavero and Sam Ginzburg will be making their final home appearances when the UMass men's soccer team plays host to the Northeastern Huskies tomorrow morning at 11 a.m. on Upper Boyden tundra. Northeastern picked a good weekend to visit Amherst, as the Minutemen are coming off Wednesday's emotionally draining effort against rival University of Connecticut.

The 2-0 defeat was UMass' sixth of the season (against seven wins) and perhaps their most painful; shaky defensive play in the second half contributed to both goals, and cost UMass any chance of pulling off an upset.

"I feel like we found ourselves as a team (against UConn)," said UMass coach Jeff Gettler. "Excluding the two mistakes, the kind of committment, mentality that we did . . . I found out a lot of things about this team that I was happy to find out about."

The mistakes, however, are hard to forget, and the emotional drain of preparing and playing UConn may show its toll tomorrow. How can the Minutemen recover in time to face Northeastern?

"In past years, we've always seemed to trip over the UConn game," said Gettler. "the game after UConn we usually don't play well . . . we can't let that happen."

Northeastern will bring a 2-5 record to foliage country, having most recently endured a pair of overtime defeats to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Bryant College. In their sixth season of intercollegiate play since restoring the program from a club to a varsity sport, the Huskies have apparently found their coach of the future in Keith Cammidge, now in his second year.

"They were horrible," Gettler said, "they're a much better team (under Cammidge), they're much better organized."

Sophmore Joe Belenardo leads the team offense with six goals scored, and aggressive veteran goalkeeper Rich Cardone ("he's a wildman" said Gettler) is capable of turning in a spectacular day's work.

The Minutemen are looking to finish out the season on the road to recovery, and re-establish themselves on Boyden following the UConn "aberration" (Gettler's words), where they have posted a 6-2 record this season.

"My job is to make this team realize their potential," said Gettler. "They're just starting to do that, UConn was just a glimmer, in amongst the loss there were some real bright spots. We've got a lot of stuff we can still accomplish this season."

Free Kicks: UMass's Steve Cesnek ranks second in the Atlantic 10 overall scoring standings.

Other UMass sports in action

With Homecoming weekend comes a full schedule for sports teams at the University of Massachusetts.

This afternoon, the men's tennis team takes to Boyden Courts at 3 p.m. to face Clark University.

Also, tonight, the UMass men's water polo team hits the water for its first and only local appearance of the season in the Amherst/UMass Tournament. Because UMass doesn't have a regulation facility, UMass has to play any home meets at Amherst.

The goaltending duties have been split by senior Anne Sherow and sophomore Merridee Proost. Each have allowed three goals on the season, and Proost has four shutouts while Sherow has posted two.

The home advantage looms large in this one. Not only is it a matter of UMass being on the road, but playing in a place that would put the Boston Garden mystique to shame. The Tarheels have never lost a game at home.

But seeing what his old team was able to do, Rudy has a good feeling about tomorrow's game.

"I like our chances of beating Carolina," Rudy said.

But North Carolina isn't the only focus. The Minutewomen must come right out of Chapel Hill, no matter the result, and attack North Carolina State on Sunday. The Wolfpack has proven that they are on a level with their intrastate rivals, through a 1-1 tie on Sept. 20, and deserving of their second ranking.

N.C. State, coached by Larry Gross, has the North Carolina game and a tie against George Mason in the final game of the recent Waggs Tournament as the only smudges on its 13-0-2 season record. The Pack won the George Mason game in overtime on penalty kicks, but only to decide the tourney champ. The game goes down as a tie in the NCAA record book.

Rudy had a chance to scout N.C. State at the Waggs Tourney, and came away impressed.

"They're tough and fast, and they have three tough front-runners who are vicious hitters. They just stick it in," Rudy said. He cited that opposing goalies often go into shock after facing a shot off the rocket-launching legs of the Wolfpack forwards. This should be a good challenge for UMass goalie Carla DeSantis, who has allowed just two goals in 10 games this year.

The big guns up front are a pair of imports from the Great White North. Sophomore forwards Charmane Hooper and Fabienne Gareau both hail from Canada, where they were both members of that country's national team. Hooper leads the Pack with 10 goals and seven assists, with Gareau right behind with nine goals and six assists. Also capable of lighting it up is senior forward Debbie Liske, with seven goals and four assists.

Sue Montagne (8) and the women's soccer team will bump heads with the top two teams in the nation when they travel to North Carolina this weekend.

But it doesn't end with the forwards. Rudy says that the Wolfpack also has a decent midfield and a very young backfield.

(five trips to the Final Four — all for naught), would like to take its turn at the top. A good showing would at least certify them as one of the best in the land.

"We need to break down the North Carolina attack, and take away the things that they like to do," Rudy said. "But it's going to take the best effort out of everyone to do it. We know that we can play."

Needless to say, it's a test. UMass, which has played the bridesmaid in the North Carolina wedding far too much in the past few years, would like to take the bride out of the world.

Now they want to prove that to the rest of the world.

Soccer to battle the best

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

This weekend may be Homecoming, but there's a good reason the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team can be excused from participating in the festivities.

The Minutewomen have some very important business to tend to. It's not often that a team is presented an opportunity to play the only teams in the entire country who can boast of being better, all in the span of 24 hours.

UMass leaves today for North Carolina, where it will prepare to face the nation's top-ranked team, the University of North Carolina, tomorrow at 1 p.m in Chapel Hill. Sunday, it's on to Raleigh where No. 2 North Carolina State will be waiting.

Short of a potential Final Four trip, this is the biggest weekend of the year for the Minutewomen.

"This is the biggest weekend I've ever had," says coach Jim Rudy. "I haven't had anything like this since 1981." Then, Rudy's Central Florida team played in a tournament against the seventh-, fourth-, second- and first-ranked teams on consecutive days.

But that was postseason. This weekend was planned long ago, and the scenario couldn't be drawn up any better now than it was then.

In North Carolina, the Minutewomen will have an opponent that has dominated the national women's soccer scene for some time. The Lady Tarheels have won five of the last six national titles, including last year, when they knocked off UMass, 1-0, in the final game at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

There isn't as much at stake this time around. UMass has a golden chance to push itself to the top of the charts, and Rudy feels that North Carolina is more vulnerable now than last season.

"I don't think [they're as good as last year]," Rudy said. "They're good, but they can be beaten."

Or at least tied. Rudy's former squad at Central Florida proved that on Sunday, a game in which they led before the Tarheels fought back to gain the deadlock. That was proof enough to Rudy that North Carolina is not invincible.

But they are number one. The Tarheels are 10-0-2 on the season, also fit to be tied by North Carolina State. Coach Anson Dorrance lost just three players to graduation from last year's winners, so nearly the full nucleus of a big winner returns.

Leading the Tarheels is junior midfielder Shannon Higgins, who has seven goals and 11 assists. Senior forward Wendy Gebauer, last year's leading scorer, follows with seven goals and five assists.

Minutemen ready to tackle UConn

There is plenty of incentive for both teams considering UMass is tied with Villanova for the conference lead at 3-0. The Huskies are 3-2 overall, and 1-2 in the conference.

There are not a lot of people, including UMass players, who would have ventured to say the Minutemen would be in this position at this point in the season.

"When the season began, we didn't know how things would be," UMass head coach Jim Reid said. "We had no identity. But I knew we had a good group and I knew it was going to be fun for Jim Reid and his staff."

The fun has continued all season, but only because of the serious attitude the team has taken.

"I disciplined three players very early in the season because we had a rule about players not driving their cars to night meetings," Reid said. "Three players did, and they had to run the Stadium steps 10 times. The entire team ran them. They felt the players legitimately misunderstood and they stuck with them. It all depends on the group you have."

This season, the Minutemen have a group that doesn't dump off responsibility. For the first three games, the young defense was porous and the offense took up the slack, establishing itself as the fourth-highest scoring team in the nation (35.4 points per game).

But during the last two games, the offense hasn't been as powerful and the defense has carried the team.

If both units are at their peak in the same week, some team may be sorry. Yet that may be what's needed tomorrow.

"We'll have to play error-free football to win," Reid said.

UConn is led by sophomore quarterback Matt DeGennaro, who has completed 61.7 percent of his passes (100-of-162), for 1099 yards, 7 touchdowns, and 7 interceptions.

But DeGennaro pulled a muscle in his rib cage area last Saturday and may not be able to play this week.

DeGennaro's main target is wide receiver Glenn Antrum, who is third in the nation in receiving (34 catches for 556 yards and 4 touchdowns).

The Huskies also have a pair of very capable running backs in Jeff Gallaher and George Boothe.

Defensively, "they have excellent defensive backs and they're aggressive up front. I know [UConn coach] Tom Jackson was concerned about his defensive line earlier this season. But if I were coaching them, I'd be happy at this point."

But it is doubtful Reid would trade the defenders he has now. In the last six quarters, they have allowed 7 points. Last week against Rhode Island, UMass recovered 7 fumbles. The week before against Boston University, the defense tipped 18 passes.

Offensively, the Minutemen are led by senior quarterback Dave Palazzi, who earlier this season broke the UMass career records for completions (now 335) and total offense (now 5260).

Palazzi has completed 70 of 137 passes for 1033 yards, 9 touchdowns and 8 interceptions. Four of the interceptions came last week in the rain at Rhode Island.

Mike Tobin (83) and the Minutemen hope to run past UConn tomorrow at Alumni Stadium.

Tailback Kevin Smellie is the leading rusher with 407 yards and 3 touchdowns, and split end Chip Mitchell averages 18.3 yards a catch and has scored 4 times.

But according to Reid, it's not the talent, but the attitude, that makes this team successful.

"People like Bill Buttler, Nick Salmon and John McKeown have stepped forward and aren't afraid to take accountability for the team," Reid said. "And the young people are doing their job."

The combination has answered every question that's been thrown at the UMass football team so far this season.

Extra points: The last time UMass was 4-1 was 1986, in Reid's first year as head coach. That team also won its fifth game and finished the season at 8-3 and with a one-third share of the Yankee Conference title. Do the 1988 Minutemen remind Reid of his rookie year?

"You can't compare," Reid said. "They did it and we haven't yet."

The last time UMass was 3-0 in the conference was 1979. . . Since the series began in 1897, the Minutemen hold a 31-25-2 advantage. . . The Huskies have won the last two meetings.

Offensive outburst keys 8-0 win for field hockey

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

The wind was blowing and it was cold enough to be wearing gloves and winter coats yesterday at Totman Field. But for the University of Massachusetts' field hockey team, yesterday's game with Fairfield University was like a day in the hot summer sun.

The Minutewomen coasted to a 8-0 shellacking of the Stags en route to their 11th win of the season. UMass, ranked No. 3 in the country by the NCAA, is now 11-1-1. Fairfield drops to 1-8.

UMass will play another game at home tomorrow it does battle with the University of New Hampshire at 12 p.m.

The Minutewomen knew they were heavy, heavy favorites to win yesterday's game coming in. The Stags had only scored three goals in eight games against a very weak Division I schedule. Its lone win was over the University of Lowell.

For UMass, yesterday's game was a time to try knew things, experiment with new plays, and make personal statistics look good.

But it was also a break that the Minutewomen needed at this point in the season after playing a majority of their schedule against teams that have been ranked in the Top 20 of the nation at one time or another during the season.

"It was what we wanted," UMass coach Pam Hixon said. "We wanted some competition other than practice. We're at the half-way point. Now its time for us to get a little enthusiasm back, get the fire back."

Competition? The enthusiasm and fire certainly was there but the scouts from

Recruit commits to UMass

By RONN GARRY
Collegian Staff

The recruiting situation continues to go well for the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team, as another blue-chip prospect has made a verbal commitment to attend UMass in the fall of 1989.

Tony Barbee, a 6-foot-6 forward/guard, of Indianapolis' North Central High School has told the Minutemen that he will attend the University next year.

"He has committed," to go to UMass, Barbee's high school coach, Steve Coffman said yesterday in a phone interview.

First-year UMass head coach John Calipari said he could neither confirm or deny the report.

Calipari did say, "We have been recruiting him for three years now."

"All I can say is that recruiting [in general] is going O.K." he said.

According to a story in the Springfield Union-News, Barbee has been considered by some to be a "Big Ten caliber player" and has chosen UMass over other schools such as Purdue and Kentucky.

Coffman said Barbee is a better small forward but can easily fit into a big guard position.

"He'll make a very good adjustment. He won't have any problems," Coffman said.

If Barbee signs a letter of intent, which he is expected to do Oct. 28 or 29, he will join Calipari's other top recruits, Jim McCoy, a 6-3 guard from Pittsburgh, and Keith Harris, a 6-6 transfer from Kansas University, and Anton Brown, a 6-2 guard from Columbia, S.C.

Volleyball hosts a pair

By RONN GARRY
Collegian Staff

Finally, for the first time in three weekends, the University of Massachusetts volleyball team will be at home. It gives Homecoming a whole different meaning, right?

The Minutewomen will entertain West Virginia University tonight at 7 p.m. in Totman Gymnasium and then play Duquesne University on Saturday, also at 7 p.m. in Totman.

UMass has a 6-2 record in those weekend games but the wear and tear of the road is beginning to take its toll.

"It will be nice to finally be home. I realize they [the players] have a lot of work, and I understand that," UMass coach Carol Ford said.

Being at home has its disadvantages. WVU and Duquesne don't want to be the perfect guests. Both teams are Atlantic 10 opponents and will be looking to knock off the Minutewomen who are 1-1 in the conference.

"I'm looking at this match as a test for us. We've kind of reached a plateau," Ford said.

"If [the players] play like they did against Holy Cross— intensity, we passed well, and served tough. It shouldn't be any different."

The Lady Mountaineers of WVU have already beaten some of the top teams in the country, including the University of California-Fullerton and Syracuse University.

Cops continue crackdown

By RICK SASSON
Collegian Staff

Amherst police, apparently carrying out a crackdown promised by Chief Donald Maia last week, arrested at least 28 people this Homecoming weekend, primarily for alcohol-related offenses.

Police records for Saturday night were unavailable yesterday, but the Sunday Republican reported 28 arrests between Friday night and Saturday afternoon.

"It was very busy," said officer John Chudzik, adding that many offenders were minors in possession of alcohol, violators of the open container law, "and one or two disorderlies."

Chudzik said the weekend was on par with last week, when about 60 people were arrested. Police were also busy breaking up parties after receiving noise complaints, he said.

Police are also investigating whit they described as an illegal bar operating at a house on North Pleasant Street rented by University of Massachusetts students. More arrests are expected to result from that probe, police said.

Last week, Maia said his department will patrol in full force each weekend until complaints about alcohol-related incidents drop in number. Maia told the Collegian he was "sick" of the continued disrespect for the law and the complaints he received from townspeople, students, and "people who just want a decent night's sleep."

The UMass Department of Public Safety does not release information regarding weekend activities until Monday mornings, and Public Safety Director Arthur Hilson could not be reached for comment yesterday. But the number of officers on hand at Saturday's football game against the University of Connecticut indicated a busy weekend.

As UMass alumni flocked to Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium, many were greeted by officers, who informed them of the new rules on alcohol, asking violators to pour out their beer.

Alumni interviewed Saturday said they were surprised to learn how stringent the alcohol rules had become since they graduated. William Santos, a 1985 graduate with a degree in industrial engineering, said, "I was shocked when I was asked to pour my beer on the ground."

Santos, who was visiting from Connecticut, said he no longer plans to contribute to the Annual Fund, the money collected by the University from graduates and their families.

"I'm not going to contribute to this police state," he said. "The next thing you know, they're going to want to take our urine samples."

Last spring, Chancellor Joseph Duffey announced a ban on alcohol at University-sponsored events, effectively ending tailgating at sporting events and drinking at outdoor concerts. The announcement was met with one of the largest University of Massachusetts' student protests in recent times.

In August, the Board of Trustees approved the ban, which Duffey called indefinite.

Eric Snoek, who heads the Annual Fund at UMass, said it is unclear whether the alcohol ban will have an effect on alumni contributions.

"It's like anything else on campus. Everyone has a different opinion," Snoek said. "For everyone who thinks the alcohol ban is a problem, there will be someone who thinks it's a much-needed improvement."

Snoek said it will take at least another semester of looking at overall trends in contributions to determine if the alcohol ban has any effect.

New light system cuts energy waste

By GEORGE FRANCY

An unoccupied room. The lights are on. Suddenly they shut off. Someone walks into the room and the lights come back on. Why?

The answer is a body-heat sensor that shuts lights off when a room is empty, and turns them on when someone walks in.

Diane Jacoby, senior electrical design engineer for the Physical Plant, said the new system is being installed in rooms on campus to cut down on energy wasted when lights are left on in an unoccupied room.

She said the sensors, which cost about $30 each, are sensitive enough to detect the body heat of even one person in a room. They are wired directly into the lighting system of the room in 15 to 20 minutes.

"The idea is to keep lights off when the room is not being used," Jacoby said. "We've started putting them in offices and we'll probably start putting them in classrooms."

"We don't really have figures that say how much this saves, but we have an intuitive feel that this is going to save money. It's something we're going to keep on doing as we have the opportunity and the money," she said.

In total, five or six rooms on campus, including one office in Draper Hall and a lab in the Morrill Science Center, have been wired with the system in the last four months, she said.

She said the use of the room determines whether the system is necessary. If a room is in use all day, there would really be no reason to have the system, she said.

Condom use rises as fears of AIDS spread

By JANINE WARNER
Collegian Staff

The 1950s produced the last generation of men to take any responsibility for protection during sex, said an expert in the field of human sexuality in a recent lecture in the Campus Center.

In 1961, with the legalization of the birth control pill, the condom was "thrown out," said Dr. Bernie Zilbergeld, a clinical psychologist and a guest lecturer from California. "The pill was more convenient and seemed to work better," he said. "It seemed that every woman in America was on the pill, so many men simply stopped using condoms."

As the fear of AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases spreads through the country, men are again starting to use condoms, he said.

Zilbergeld said he tries to make his workshops appeal to men, but participants are still 90 percent women. He said he is criticized for putting the burden of safer sex on women, but "you have to sell to who is buying."

Gretchen Krull, coordinator of the Peer Sex Education Program at Health Services, said she is finding more men attending workshops that promote safer sex.

One reason men don't attend workshops, according to Krull, is that it is harder for men to admit there are things they don't understand. "A lot of men have been told that they're supposed to know everything there is about sexuality," she said.

Male turnout has a lot to do with how you bill a workshop, Krull said. Titles such as; "Getting what you want without the worry," and "How to be a better lover," are geared toward the male student body and result in a much higher turnout than a workshop which is just about safer sex or birth control.

For men who are not concerned about safer sex, comments such as, "women these days are really into guys who are into safer sex," and "condoms help keep an erection," have helped him to convince men to use condoms, Zilbergeld said.

Another approach is to educate men in groups such as football teams or fraternities, he said. "Most athletes listen pretty closely to their coaches," he said. "If you can get a coach to endorse safer sex you get their attention."

Krull said workshops in the Greek area are proving more successful.

Knowledge about safer sex is not enough to assure its practice, however, and both Krull and Zilbergeld said they are working to promote better communication between partners.

Zilbergeld has actually produced a tape of a man and a woman discussing practicing safer sex. The tape offers an actual dialogue and offers many suggestions on how to approach the subject.

Many books are also available to suggest dialogues around the subject of safer sex, Krull said.

But, don't wait until you're "hot and heavy" to start talking, said Zilbergeld. "In the heat of the moment, many good intentions are pushed aside."

Bringing up safer sex is easier when sex is postponed, said Zilbergeld. "By the end of the third date most people going out have had sex."

"We've lost the process of slowly getting into sex," he said. "When couples get into sex quickly they are likely to have bad sex. It's also the time when people are least comfortable with each other and are least likely to protect themselves."

Krull warned the use of drugs and alcohol also make it difficult to discuss safer sex. "Alcohol reduces inhibitions," she said. "Those inhibitions are there for a reason."

When people use alcohol to cover those inhibitions they never learn to talk about sex, Krull said. "People should think of more creative ways to feel comfortable having sex."

Zibergeld said convincing people to practice safe sex will be a long, slow process.

"Look at how many years it took for people to realize that smoking was bad. And look at how many millions of people still do it," he said.

Battle lines drawn over Ques. 2

BOSTON, (AP) — They carry signs at street corners and rotaries, in front of town halls and post offices, along construction sites and highway overpasses.

They are the "Vote on Question 2" forces seeking to preserve the state's prevailing wage law, and they appear to be everywhere.

Everywhere, that is, except where it costs — and possibly counts — the most: on the airwaves. On radio and television, the proponents of "yes" on Question 2 dominate.

With three weeks left before the Nov. 8 election, the two sides have adopted widely differing strategies in the battle over referendum question No. 2, which asks voters to repeal the prevailing wage law.

The law, passed in 1914, requires state, county, city and town governments to pay non-union employees the "prevailing" — usually union rate in the region where they work.

Contractors, municipal officials and others pushing to repeal the law are concentrating their resources on a judge media blitz, a $600,000 television campaign that started over the weekend.

Labor unions that want to keep the law, on the other hand, are pinning their hopes on a grass-r????in parades.

While the "yes" forces will be getting expensive TV time, the "no" forces hope to reach as many people at a fraction of the cost by hand delivering a million pamphlets to doorsteps across the state.

"The advantage we've always felt we had is that we represent people, while our opponents represent corporations," said John Laughlin, spokesman for the "Vote No" campaign.

The "yes" forces bristle at the suggestion that they represent corporations. They count more than 50 public officials, citizens groups, and small business organizations in their coalition. But they acknowledge that they have left grass roots organizing entirely to their opponents.

"We're prepared to match them in a media war down the home stretch, but we know we're not going to be able to match them as far as organization, and we're not even going to try," said Stephen Tocco, executive director of the Associated Building Contractors of Massachusetts.

Tocco said he came to that decision after last fall's petition drive to get the referendum on the ballot. Although the drive was successful, people gathering signatures were harassed and sometimes shoved in many cities, he said.

"This shouldn't become a street fight, and I'm worried that it could," Tocco said. "So we made a deliberate decision to pull back and concentrate on endorsements from public officials and the media campaign.

"If people are going to make their decision about a complicated public policy issue on the basis of a sign or a bumper sticker, we're in trouble. But I don't think they will."

Each side insists that the other is better heeled financially, a dispute that is impossible to sort out because of a recent ruling by the state Office of Campaign and Political Finance exempting trade unions from financial reporting requirements.

Tocco said the "yes" forces hope to raise and spend a total of about $750,000. Even so, he said he foresees the opposition spending about three times the money, putting $1 million to $1.5 million into TV ads alone.

Experimental use of new AIDS drug authorized

BOSTON (AP) — Boston City Hospital has the green light to begin experimental use of a new variety of the drug AZT on up to 40 adults it is treating for the disease AIDS.

The hospital reported that a new $3 million federal program also will allow doctors to use the anti-virus drug AZT for the first time on its growing case load of children with the disease.

The experimental variety to be used on the adults, called dideoxyinosine or ddI, is believed to be less toxic to the blood-making cells of the bone marrow than AZT.

It may be a big help to recovering drug addicts as well as other AIDS patients because it need not be administered every four hours, as does AZT.

"ddI is the most promising of the new anti-viral drugs that may be useful in treating AIDS patients," said Dr. Howard Liebman, medical director of the hospital's AIDS service. "Patients seem to tolerate the drug well.

"It doesn't cause much suppression of the blood and it raises the level of immune cells or T-4 cells."

AIDS, or acquired immune deficiency syndrome, is a virus ailment that attaches the body's defense system. It is transmitted chiefly by sexual contact and use of hypodermic needles and there is no known cure.

Boston City Hospital said up to 40 adult patients taking part in trials will be hospitalized for 16 days to get the new drug intravenously, then will get the drug orally for four weeks as outpatients while doctors study the response.

The hospital now is treating 13 children with AIDS, most of them under 1 year old. The oldest youngster in treatment is a 3 1/2-year-old child who first had symptoms two months after birth.

Dr. Stephen Pelton, who will direct the five-year hospital program, said less than 200 children with AIDS have received AZT.

He said some youngsters being treated at Children's Hospital and the New England Medical Center for the disease were only recently able to begin use of AZT.

Boston City Hospital and Children's Hospital are among 13 US centers for treatment of pediatric AIDS.

The National Cancer Institute earlier this month released a study of AZT treatment on 36 children with AIDS. It said there was promise in the response of the nervous system function, while toxic side effects were similar by possibly not as severe as in adult patients.

Earlier, doctors treated children with AIDS with injections of gamma globulin to prevent severe bacterial infections and with drugs to prevent pneumonia.

Pelton's team expects to see about 25 more children each year with AIDS because of mothers known to be infected with the virus.

Doctors at Boston City Hospital also are following 15 children tests show are infected with the AIDS virus, but who have not shown symptoms of immune system damage.

Teddy bears offered

By YANA DLUGY
Collegian Staff

The Amherst police and fire departments have added a new feature to their cruisers and ambulances — teddy bears.

The committee for Amherst's Teddy Bear Rally has given a large number of teddy bears to the Amherst Fire Department and the Amherst Police Department. The proceeds came from Amherst's Sixth Annual Teddy Bear Rally that was held on Amherst Town Common Aug. 6.

The bears will be given to children in traumatic situations, such as injuries, accidents, and family crises.

Assistant Fire Chief Paul Lalonde generated the idea of using the stuffed animals in this manner.

The toys will serve as a communication tool as well as provide emotional support for children.

"It's a useful tool if you can't communicate with the child for some reason," Lalonde said. "It can be used as an intermediary."

Lalonde said every fire department's ambulance contains two teddy bears which will be given to a child to comfort them.

"We'll actually give the child a teddy bear to keep," he said.

Lalonde could not comment on the response to the idea, since it has only been in use for four days.

No age limits have been set on whether or not a person can receive a teddy bear. That is left to the discretion of the ambulance attendant, but Lalonde said anyone should "feel free to make a request for a teddy bear if one has not been offered."

The police department has been given the same teddy bears as the fire department to use in their emergencies, according to Lalonde.

Before a teddy bear is placed in an ambulance, all the tags are taken off. "We take all the plastic off, so we don't have any inappropriate digestion," Lalonde said.

It has not been yet decided whether or not the fire trucks will carry teddy bears.

"We may or may not put them on the fire trucks," Lalonde said. "It's a much harsher environment for a teddy bear to be in."

Lalonde said it is not essential for fire trucks to carry teddy bears, because if there is a need for one at a fire, one could be taken from an ambulance or a police car.

The rally committee, in addition to the gifts of bears to the police and fire departments, has also given $4,000 to the Amherst Rotary Club for its Polio Plus project, $3,000 to the Hampshire County Association for Retarded Citizens, and $500 to the Advocacy Network.

Plans are now being made for the seventh Teddy Bear Rally, which will take place Aug. 5, 1989.

Fadel answers DA's questions

By GEORGE FRANCY
Collegian Staff

Student Government Association Speaker Robert Fadel has returned his answers to a series of questions posed by a member of the Hampshire County District Attorney's Office.

These questions were posed to determine if the SGA is a governmental body as defined by state law and must follow the Massachusetts open-meeting law.

Fadel moved the Sept. 8 meeting of the SGA Coordinating Committee into executive session, apparently to discuss misuse of student monies by then-chairman of the SGA Budgets Committee Gil Penchina. The move into executive session barred all non-members of the committee from the meeting. No minutes were taken for the meeting, according to Fadel.

Steve Samolewicz, director of public rights for the district attorney's office, would not reveal the actual questions. He said that since they are part of an ongoing investigation they are not yet public documents.

He said the questions concerned how the SGA gets and spends money, and how members of the SGA are elected. He said that from these answers he would be able to determine whether the SGA is a governmental body as defined by state law.

Samolewicz said he might be able to issue a letter of opinion on the matter as early as the end of this week.

Collegian Editor in Chief Pedro Pereira has asked the district attorney's office to investigate Fadel's actions to see if they were a violation of the open-meeting law.

"I asked for the investigation to find out if the law was broken, and if it was, what we can do to learn what went on and to prevent similar situations in the future," said Pereira.

"The SGA is handling $1.8 million of student money," Pereira said. "I want it to be absolutely clear whether the SGA is indeed a governmental body under the law."

Fadel has refused to comment on the matter until the investigation is complete.

Samolewicz has said that if the SGA is a governmental body as defined by the state, and they did in fact illegally move into executive session, they may have to go back and do what they did in the closed meeting again in open session.

The deadline Samolewicz set for Fadel to reply was last Friday.

Fadel said he delivered the answers to the questions to Samolewicz's office on Friday.

Child care top priority for CAG

By GEORGE FRANCY
Collegian Staff

While the Undergraduate Student Senate was holding elections last week, the Commuter Area Government was also holding elections for its governing board, which represents the interests of off-campus students.

"What I'd like to see is the CAG become more of an advocacy body for off-campus issues," said CAG President Jay Festa.

Helping undergraduates pay for child care is the top concern of the 14-member board, Festa said. A system has been established that pays part of an undergraduate parent's child care costs.

Festa said child care costs run from $2,000 to $3,000 a year per child. "It's a major drain because child care isn't considered one of the expenses of college," he said.

The undergraduate parent must use a licensed child-care facility and apply for aid to a committee composed of Festa, four other undergraduates and an advisor from the financial aid office. This committee decides how much money is given to each applicant. Each parent may receive a maximum of $750.

Another project the CAG governing board is currently working on is forming tenant organizations from the major housing complexes. These groups would be similar to neighborhood organizations found in large cities.

"If all the tenants got together in the housing complexes it would be something like a union," Festa said. He said this would give them a stronger voice in the community.

Festa said the board would also like to see renovation of the Commuter Area Lounge, more usage of the Amherst rent-review board by commuter students, and greater involvement of the governing board with the UMass Transit Advisory Board, which makes recommendations to the busing system.

The CAG Governing Board is composed of the president, co-Vice Presidents Jack Cahill and Jenn MacNeish, Treasurer Keri Rogers and the 14 members who were elected last Tuesday. They are: Cheryl Hagar, Stephen Kurina, Pamela Magoun, Brian Darling, Karen Flanagan, Jennifer Powers, Mary Rita Kropp, Michael Greiner, Robb Smith, Michael Salat, Liz Hart, Brian Crawford and Jamie O'Halloran. There was a four-way for the 14th spot. Festa said he will choose one of the four for the seat.

Challenge program suffers under cuts in funding

BY JOSEPH L. HILL
Collegian Staff

The Challenge Program is an innovative project that links the University to seven high schools throughout Massachusetts. "It's basic goal is to recruit and support minority students," said Director of Admissions Timm Rinehart. It assists high school students who have demonstrated academic aptitude, but because of such limiting factors as income, may not have anticipated attending post-secondary institutions.

Two key features of the program are guaranteed admissions to the University for students who have successfully completed the Challenge program, and a four-year tuition scholarship awarded to one outstanding Challenge graduate from each of the seven high schools served by the program.

The Challenge program is now threatened with the possibility of operating under very limiting conditions. Last year, the State Board of Regents informed the University that seventy-nine thousand dollars in state funds have been earmarked for program use for fiscal year 1988-1989 - provided the request was honored in the Legislature. Approximately one month later the University was informed all state funding for the program had been wiped out. The "Legislature took back three of four million" dollars targeted "for programs like this," stated Tim Rinehart. The cut in funding represents eighty percent of the funding for the Challenge program, the rest of funding is institutional.

Chancellor Joseph Duffey and Vice Chancellor Dennis Madson have sent a letter to the Legislature expressing a concern that the cut in funding will have a "serious negative impact our campus's ability and efforts to recruit students of color and/or economic disadvantage and to maintain established relations with specific high schools in Boston, Holyoke and Springfield." The letter was concluded with a request that the Board of Regents reaffirm it's commitment to the recruitment" of these students by restoration of partial funding for the program.

In spite of the budget cut the program will continue to be operated, but on a scaled down version. The seven high schools might be effected as follows:

- Four schools in Boston will have no weekly workshops, participants will still visit campus and may still receive tuition waiver. Special consideration from Admissions will still be given to students.
- Two schools in Springfield are currently under reevaluation so funding is not needed here now, except for one class of seniors from Commerce High. The University is however, "committed to continuing the program in Springfield," said Timm Rinehart.
- The Holyoke program will continue at full strength.

Holyoke has been singled out because it has been the most productive. Regular class meetings for three credits are held there. In Addition, a professional staff person from Holyoke has been hired to assist the operation of the program there.

Although the program has yet to fulfill it's potential, the idea of successfulness has no bearing on the the budget cuts. With reasonable funding, the program can be operated efficiently in Springfield and Holyoke. With increased institutional funding (presently UMass provides twelve thousand-five hundred dollars), Boston can also be served in a better capacity. The Challenge program is definitely under a healthy reevaluation. The focus of which is to allow students to gain a fuller, more richer experience although less schools may be involved.

The program is a public service. It is a demonstration of the university's commitment to providing students who might not have considered attending college, a road to travel on. "we've definitely made a difference," stated Tim Rinehart and that is, after all, what this program is about.

Mozambique perseveres despite oppression

By SCOTT C. HILL
Collegian Correspondent

On Oct. 6, Marlies and Sytse Tjallingii, citizens of Holland who have lived in Mozambique as public school teachers for the past eight years, held a forum concerning the country of Mozambique and the terrorist activities of South Africa's apartheid government.

Mozambique is located on the eastern coast of Africa, bordering Tanzania to the north and South Africa to the south. Its history is similar to so many other African nations. It was a peaceful land with an advanced Swahili culture for thousands of years, until the 16th century when the invading imperialists came. Starting with Vasco de Gama in 1498, Europeans began stealing gold and ivory, burning towns, and taking the African people as slaves.

In 1752, Mozambique became an official colony of Portugal. Just as the rest of Europe was doing, the Portuguese immediately set up an oppressive, racist regime. The proud people of Mozambique suffered greatly under Portuguese occupation for more than 200 years, according to the lecturers.

In 1974, the Portuguese invaders were overthrown by FRELIMO [Front for the Liberation of Mozambique].The people regained control of their country and 95 percent of the Portuguese fled.

Mozambique today is a perfect example of what an independent Black nation can do for its people, Sytse Tjallingii said. Since their hated Portuguese oppressors were overthrown, the literacy rate and number of students enrolled in schools has tripled. The number of school teachers has risen from 400 to 1,900.

They now have freedom of speech, religion, and active political participation. The number of public health stations has risen from 400 to 2,000.

The apartheid government of South Africa feels threatened by the success of the Mozambiquan government, Sytse Tjallingii said.

He referred to P.W. Botha, South African president, and his confederates as racist and said they are afraid of strong Black neighbors who could greater publicize the evils of apartheid, or support to the ANC [African National Congress], which is fighting apartheid.

To combat the gains made in Mozambique and other southern African nations, "the South African government has adopted a Destabilization campaign whose sole purpose is to starve and weaken the other southern African nations," said Tjallingii.

To facilitate their Destabilization program, the South African white supremacists fund, train, and supply a terrorist army called ReNaMo. With a force of approximately 10,000 soldiers, South Africa's ReNaMo organization has destroyed thousands of the schools, hospitals, homes, and towns of the independent southern African nations, he said. In Mozambique alone, more than 1.5 million people are homeless refugees because of ReNaMo's terrorist activities, the lecturers said. Mr. and Mrs. Tjallingii showed many slides of the destruction caused by South Africa's ReNaMo.

"It is of maximum importance to spread the news about South Africa's Destabilization program," urged Mr. Tjallingii. The lecturers then distributed flyers highlighting the horrors of the apartheid government in and out of South Africa. The Tjallingii's implored students to write to their congressmen to have them support the Dellums/Cranston Bill for comprehensive sanctions against South Africa.

They further faulted the United States and the Republican in particular for indirectly supporting apartheid By all means necessary, the stain of apartheid must be eliminated from the continent of Africa.

Students of color find expression in theater

By THOMAS MAMBANDE
Collegian Staff

In recent years the Pioneer Valley has been experiencing "culture shock", as the area's students of color have striven to leave their mark on an otherwise culturally homogenous environment. One of the areas most profoundly affected by the introduction of so called Third World students has been in the theatre.

At the University of Massachusetts, New World Theatre has assumed the role of the vanguard of Third World expression, producing works by Native American, African American,Asian American ,Latino and African plays such as "The Lion and The Jewel', "Sneaky' (a work of Native American origin) , "The Wine in the Wilderness Alice Childress, and most recently James Baldwin's "Blues For Mister Charlie".

In addition to producing actual works the New World Theatre has sponsored workshops by visiting theatre companies and personalities that have included Japan's Suzuki, South Africa's Vusiswe, and the Carpetbag Theatre Company based in the North American South.

At Amherst College, Black students organized the Spectrum theatre group to serve the needs of their student body for theatrical expression. The group is entirely run by the students who make up the company. Most recently Spectrum produced "Day of Absence," by Douglass Turner Ward. Black students at Smith College have, in recent years, demonstrated their need for self-expression. Last year, black women performed "Seven Principles', a work collectively written by seven black women based upon their experiences as women of color at the predominately white college. Also produced was Ntozake Shange's "Colored Girls".

At Mt.Holyoke College "Shades of Expression' performs in it's capacity as a group "dedicated to promoting works by people of color,"said Suzanne Walsh, a sophomore who is co-director of the company.

"We do one big show every year.The theme is always geared towards promoting people of color in a positive light,"according to Suzanne Walsh.

Last year Shades of expression performed "Moving Toward the Sun." Suzzanne portrayed a Latina woman facing the dilemma of assimilation into a white society. Because of her light complexion and features she was accepted by the whites around her and was privy to their innermost thoughts and feelings concerning her people. The piece portrayed her evolution from acceptance of her people's denigration at the hands of the whites to her condemnation of the white oppressors. "

Shades of Expression has approximately thirty members which include both actresses and dancers. In addition to their campus productions the group is also active in youth outreach, each year doing a tour of Springfield's high schools.They hope to educate youth on the issues of color and racism.

Can a white man, sitting as a judge, understand the black prisoners who confront him at the bar of justice? Author/Judge Bruce Wright's book Black Robes White Justice explores this potent issue. This picture painted by this book is that a judge, no matter how decent his intentions, cannot possibly understand where the so called "Black criminal" is coming from. Frankly because the average judge has not lived in the environment, or experienced frustration and degradation of being Black in America.

Judge Bruce Wright earned the nickname, "Turn'em Loose Bruce" upon releasing a black thirty year old Manhattan College student, accused of attacking a police officer, own his own recognizance. Judge Wright pointed out that bail is not intended to be punitive, but rather a guarantee that the accused will return to court to face charges.

This is but one example of the many awkward collisions the "Black criminal" has had with white American Justice as seen by Judge Wright.

Black Robes White Justice critically examines the inequalities ingrained in our legal system. It is an investigation into the origins of the inequities, provides examples of and proposes remedies in the hope of creating a justice system that will be equitable for all.

Democracy lost at home

The things I love best about Amherst are the rally's and the pickets. Every demonstration, boycott, referendum is a sign that democracy is not dead. People "in the streets" brought us the great democratic advances of our era: the Civil Rights Movement, the end of the Vietnam War and, if history is to be trusted, the same actions will end the wars in Central America.

The six UMass students who travel to Washington DC this weekend to protest US intervention in Central America are doing as much for democracy in our own country as they are for our brothers and sisters in El Salvador and Nicaragua.

Daria Casinelli

I agree with Ronald Reagan, mark it down folks, it's a first, that we're all involved in a battle for democracy. The United States under Ronald Reagan, and under is the most appropriate word, has been waging a not-so-secret war against democracy here and in Central America.

The people of Nicaragua and El Salvador have been demonstrating their will for almost a decade. They want us out. The fact that I no longer have to explain to you where Nicaragua or El Salvador is located, is a sign that they're winning that war. The citizens of the United States, on the other hand, seem to be losing the war for democracy right here in our own country.

I could quote the limpid yellow swath of voting statistics and proclaim democracy dead that way, but I don't judge the democratization of a country by how many people vote, but by whether it is truly governed by the will of the people. Here, the will of the people is not confined to five minutes deliberation on Nov. 8 as to which white man will exercise a significant portion of your rights for you for the next four years, but it is rather confined to the Congress.

The Congress has made it clear that it does not support the war in Central America and the administration has made it clear that it doesn't care about the will of the people. The administration has done the following:

- violated the Boland Amendment, which prohibited the use of funds to over throw the Nicaraguan government
- circumvented CIA spending caps imposed by Congress by soliciting funds from third party countries
- violated the War Powers Act by misleading the Congress regarding the dangers facing US advisors in El Salvador.

The will of the people has been violated so many times in our own country that on Oct. 15, 16, and 17 hundreds of thousands of people will go to Washington DC, as they have repeatedly, to demand that our government abide by our will. My fellow students are going to break the law to let the rest of the country know that no law is legitimate that does not have the consent of the people.

Democracy cannot be confined by Congress, renegade presidencies, riot police, or by torture here, or in El Salvador.

The Salvadorian people are about to throw off the proverbial yoke of imperialism and get on with the project of democracy in their own right. The best we can do to welcome them into the fold of democracy, is to fight for democracy in our own country.

Daria Casinelli is a UMass student

They said it. . .

"You'd be surprised how politics seem to fascinate people, people who wouldn't for five minutes actually get into the act themselves. They like it as spectators: it's the greatest spectator sport in the country. People begin as strangers and in a little while they know the names and numbers of all the players; a little while more, and they're telling the coaches how to run things."

Odds and ends

Time and time again, you have to find the time

Human nature dictates that we are all inclined toward nervous habits. This is particularly true of students, who have a lot to worry about. I like to make lists. All things that need to be done right now are written down; I refer to this as "itemizing my responsibilities." I've seen other students making useless schedules as well. These lists, which rarely get a second glance, contain typical student stuff:

Read history handout, English paper, column due at noon.

These lists can be compiled at any time. I'm most inclined to write them during long classes. Notebook margins were created for such nervous activity.

One nervous habit we all share is clock-watching.

11:06 a.m.

I find it infuriating that two of the four clock faces on the chapel are obscured by a tree. In one of today's more appropriate fashion statements, many students have started wearing large clocks on strings around their necks. What could be more of an albatross on our lives than time? As students, we worship time. It's one of the few things over which we can exercise any control. Or so we think.

John Swanson

Call travel agent, call home, meet with professor B.

These two activities go hand in hand. As we run out of time, we feel the need to make lists, as if somewhere along the line, we'll find time to do what needs to be done. We get the false sense that we're buying time.

11:39 a.m.

While cleaning my room recently, I came across five old lists. Many of the items written on them had been accomplished, many had not. Nonetheless, I could not remember reading any of those lists a second time.

Cash check, buy food, eat dinner.

That got me thinking. Is life really supposed to be a planned series of events, totally devoid of spontaneity? After all, how useful is a list that is never read? Eventually all these little pieces of paper run together; life becomes one long list whose final instruction is "die."

12:02 p.m.

It's tough for us to realize that doing what needs to be done is more useful than thinking about doing it. I'm sure we'll all continue making lists, checking the clock and falling behind. They're hard habits to break. Perhaps all of us list-making, clock-watchers should quit now while there's time.

Denton's data deceives

Rusty Denton has once again proved himself to be confused and upset that anyone should be proud to be gay, lesbian, or bisexual. His writings on the topic are usually beneath response. This time, however, ("Some facts and myths about homosexuality, Oct. 11) he set up a lie so shabby that I just cannot resist the easy shot.

Denton cites figures from a fundamentalist Christian group showing that 90 percent of gay and bisexual men had emotionally absent fathers, and a total of 100 percent of lesbians had a physically or emotionally abusive father.

If one is "science-literate," one can plainly see that the Exodus International figures come from a very specifically skewed data base: gays who want to change. What about happy gays? What are our fathers like? Exodus International doesn't hear from the many hundreds of thousands of us, so they just don't know. Perhaps abusive and absent fathers make their children — be they gay or straight or bisexual — so unable to accept themselves as they are, they are driven to the simplest fringes of religion as escape.

I don't know why I am gay. I don't much care. I do know that blaming parents is silly and inappropriate. No blame is needed, just acceptance of the grand diversity of human love.

Should one of your children grow up gay, I recommend that you seek out the local chapter of P-FLAG: Parents and Friends of Lesbians and Gays. You will meet all kinds of people, including some wonderful, gentle, loving fathers who are proud of their children just the way they are.

Feminist finds faults

This letter is addressed to all sexist homophobes, particularly Rusty Denton ("Some facts and myths about homosexuality," Oct. 11).

I am a sophomore woman, a radical feminist, and a heterosexual. Feminism strives to liberate women from situations that prevent them from fulfilling their ultimate human potential. We are repressed. Being a feminist does not make me a man-hater or a Jezebel. One sex is not above the other. Everyone is equal, and we should love and accept each other.

People say that homosexuality is by choice. That's absurd. Who would choose to be forever persecuted? I wouldn't, and neither would my gay/bisexual friends.

They are not straight, and they will never be straight, even though some have tried. Also, homosexuals are not always gay because of poor role models or fear of the opposite sex. I suppose that some homosexuals are, but none of the ones that I know.

I've never heard anyone of authority claim that homosexuality is genetically transferred. Teaching people not to be gay sounds more like teaching them to go back into the closet. Some scientists have used shock therapy to an extent, and in some cases it has worked, but at what cost to human dignity?

The world is an awfully big place and the only way that we can achieve our goals is if we all work together civilly. I try very hard not to judge others because I am only one person. No person really has that right. And if Judgement ever comes, I hope to be smiled upon. I hope we are all smiled upon.

Define normal, Denton

In response to Rusty Denton's column ("Some facts and myths about homosexuality," Oct. 11) I would like a definition of normal. Obviously, Denton and myself have two different definitions. Homosexuality cannot be classified in terms of normal and abnormal behavior when normalcy is defined in terms of socialization.

We are socialized into patterns that define what is or is not correct in terms of our sexual practices. Denton all to readily assumes that normalcy is what mainstream culture says it is. I feel bad for Denton if he believes in everything mainstream culture dictates.

As for his assumptions that there is a way for these poor abused persons that turned to homosexuality as a means to cope with a dysfunctional family or an abusive situation to change back to heterosexual behavior, he is negating a lot of factors.

First, not all homosexuals come from an abusive situation. Second, it has been my experience that most heterosexuals form alliances that create the dysfunctional family. And finally, the question of why a person would put themselves into a minority class and subject themselves to the daily abuse of living as a homosexual needs to be addressed. There is more to it than Denton has suggested.

The truth about Tawana

It has finally been proven that the Tawana Brawley rape story was a big lie. After seven months of investigation, a grand jury has declared "beyond a shadow of a doubt" that Brawley had fabricated every aspect of her "ordeal," and purposely deceived authorities on every turn. She, and her charlatan "advisors" Al Sharpton, C. Vernon Mason, and Alton Maddox should be punished to the fullest extent of the law.

Stuart Gottlieb

Brawley, a 16-year-old black girl from Wappingers Falls, New York, was found nine months ago laying in a garbage bag, covered with dog feces and racial epithets. She later revealed that four or five white men had repeatedly raped and assaulted her for four days.

The story instantly reached the forefront of the American media. Controversy stirred. Racial tension peaked.

The investigation began, with the assumption that the girl had been through an extremely traumatic experience. A special prosecutor, the New York State Attorney General Robert Abrams, was assigned to the case. Justice would be brought to the racists that did this.

But Brawley's story soon proved shaky. Witnesses said they saw Brawley getting into the garbage bag and laying down in a fetal position. Hospital records revealed she wasn't raped, and despite a claim that she was wandering around for days, she was not malnourished.

Enter Al Sharpton and Company. The "gang of three" claimed that racism was engulfing the entire New York legal system, and that a big cover-up was under way. They declared that there was no use in cooperating, as no black could expect justice under the American judicial system. They also pointed the finger at several prominent Dutchess County officials as perpetrators of the crime, and demanded that they be taken into custody without providing a smidgen of evidence.

For the next six months Sharpton and Company waged a war against critical intelligence, and whipped up black hysteria against the system. Otherwise rational black media factions suspended their professionalism and became unpaid publicists and mindless cheerleaders for the "cause." Sharpton at first demanded that Alton Maddox be appointed special prosecutor, but later just demanded that it be someone he approved of, before Brawley would talk. A new approach to justice. How nice.

But wait. The curtain on the Brawley facade has just plummeted to the ground, revealing a circus of deceit and collaboration. The grand jury report revealed, based on 180 witnesses, 6,000 pages of sworn testimony, over 250 exhibits of evidence, and hundreds of thousands of dollars in taxpayers money, that Brawley not only lied, but actually put herself in the condition in which she was found. The dog feces was traced back to a dog which lived in the apartment complex where she was found, and gloves used to smear it on were found in a garbage can in the house. The razor blade used to scrawl "KKK" into one of her shoes was found in the house, as were fragments of the ripped jeans that Brawley was wearing when she was found. Combine these facts with not one shred of evidence against any of the alleged criminals and there is only one conclusion — the one the grand jury found: Brawley is a liar.

But throughout the ordeal Sharpton, Mason and Maddox have likened Abrams to Hitler. They claimed Abrams "masturbated" over the FBI photographs of a nude Tawana Brawley. They urged blacks to not accept "white man's justice."

In the end they disgraced themselves, and put an end to their self-serving conspiracy against rational egalitarian society. But even more so have they added fodder to an already tense racial atmosphere. They have hurt what they claimed they wanted to help.

Sherer's photographs study Barbados' baptists

Exhibit in Augusta Savage Gallery until Nov. 20

By REBECCA MORRISSEY
Collegian Corresponsdent

Stan Sherer's photographs Journey Into the Soul: The Spiritual Baptists of Barbados are on exhibit now in the Augusta Savage Gallery in the New Africa House.

Dr. Pearl Primus, Five College Professor of Ethnic Studies, arranged for Sherer to travel to Barbados to document a service and the consecration of Archbishop Granville Williams last January. Sherer said he wasn't planning an exhibition of the photographs at that time, but later found he had enough material for a show.

Sherer, a resident of Northampton who works for the University Campus Chronicle and a freelance photographer said, "Certainly it was a priviledge to be allowed to photograph freely in the two Spiritual Baptist churches we visited," but he said he felt "there is still a great deal more work to be done and much to be learned."

"It is a very rich and stimulating culture .... There is a great deal of crossover in this: religion, anthropology, tradition, cultural roots. . ." said Sherer, who is especially interested in photographing people of different cultures in all areas of the world.

The present exhibit he said "is really a study of who the Spiritual Baptists are; what some of the important practices, moments, and rituals are."

In his photographs, Sherer said he tries to capture the,

"external expression in movement and dance," and "show these things in a way that shows as much of the energy and power one sees in a person."

People are the subjects of his photographs.

"By showing individuals and individual rituals it is possible to get a feel for the church as a whole," said Sherer. "I am showing the parts."

But Sherer is not merely showing what he saw. "There is also a combination of documentation and interpretation since I am photographing with my own personal vision," he said.

Sherer's photographs attempt "a breaking down of peoples" so that viewers will, "experience people from the inside," he said. "The photographs go beyond the exterior and speak to the viewer's heart and soul as well as intellect . . . . This was an important extension of my work in African affairs," he said. Sherer has also photographed for some time in West Africa.

The gallery will be the sight of a special service on Sunday Oct. 23 given by the Archbishop Granville Williams of Barbados.

All are welcome. The exhibit will be at the gallery until Nov.12. Gallery hours are Monday to Friday, 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. or by appointment 545-0932.

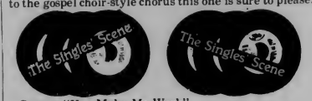
Breathe boring; Ice-T ignites

By Chris A. Muther
Collegian Correspondent

Judson Spence "Yeah Yeah Yeah"
Although a new comer to the charts, Spence has a confidence that transcends into his music. His first release, "Yeah Yeah Yeah" is a potpourri of styles blended effortlessly into one terrific song. From the reggae opening to the gospel choir-style chorus this one is sure to please.



Cameo "You Make Me Work"
A couple of years ago there was no escaping "Word Up" at any dance club, and now Cameo have tapped into their winning formula once more. Lead singer Larry Blackmon has one of the most distinctive voices in rock and it's in prime form once again. "You Make Me Work" is sure to become a dance club classic.

Johnny Hates Jazz "Turn Back The Clock"/Breathe "How Can I Fall?" It's amazing that groups can put out music that sounds like Air Supply. What's even more amazing is that people buy it. Both Breathe and Johnny Hates Jazz had huge hits this past Spring with boring ballads and their latest releases show no sign of change. Maybe Air Supply should have copyrighted their sound.

Will To Power "Baby I Love Your Way/Free Bird"
This is perhaps the strangest remake of the year. Will To Power has combined Peter Frampton's "Baby, I Love Your Way" with Lynyrd Skynyrd's "Free Bird," and the result isn't that bad. Turning the mix into a ballad, Will To Power's brand of light, breezy pop makes the song an appealing alternative to the standard remake.

Sheena Easton "The Lover In Me"
What a transformation this woman has gone through, from the sweet and sappy "Morning Train" to the sultry and sexy "Sugar Walls." Her latest sound is the rsult of her work with Prince, who has donned her with the sex kitten image. "The Lover In Me" stays close to the customary Prince dance number style, which is fine if you like Prince, but we expect more from this Scottish chameleon.

The Bangles "In Your Room"
Speaking of the Prince influence, the Bangles scored their first big hit with the Prince-penned "Manic Monday" but now have gone back to their roots. "In Your Room" is reminiscent of the Bangles' first album All Over the Place. The lyrics are more serious and the music more intense. Let Prince worry about his own records, these girls do fine by themselves.

Ice-T "I'm Your Pusher"
The conscious of rap returns to talk to us about drug use, but with an interesting twist. Last heard rapping "Colors" from the controversial gang movie of the same name, Ice-T has made a name for himself by taking up issues important to young America. In "I'm Your Pusher" he offers a safer alternative to drug use: records. It's a nice change from the usual preaching drug songs, this one tells you what to do instead.

Sparks "So Important"
This talented duo have been trying to get a hit for years, but just can't seem to find their way into the chart. They came close in 1983 with "Cool Places," a song they recorded with Jane Wiedlin and then again in 1986 with the humorous "Music That You Can Dance To," but success has alluded them. "So Important" is an appetizing taste of the talent of Sparks, but don't expect to see this one in the top 40.

A whole lot of poeple went to the UPC show at the SUB on Friday night. If you weren't there, you didn't see Camper Van Beethoven; if you were there and you didn't like Camper Van Beethoven, then you are not cool.

When I previewed the show for the Collegian on Friday, I said the police would open a new Ballroom Substation for the show. I was really only kidding, so when I saw all those police I thought they must be big fans of Camper Van Beethoven. Then I noticed they were all wearing earplugs. The police didn't dance much either; they just stood there while student security frisked everybody on the way in.

Big Dipper started the show way loud. I couldn't understand the words these guys were singing on their records, and I couldn't understand the words at the show, but they looked like the kind of intelligent and sensitive guys who would write really intelligent and sensitive lyrics, so I was willing to give them the benefit of the doubt. The truth is, they were so loud I had to spend the first hour of the show in the Earthfoods room drinking beer.

I like bands that have some other instrument besides guitars. Camper Van Beethoven has a fifth guy who plays violin and keyboards, so they don't sound exactly like all the loud bands from Boston; their tempos are almost all slower than the full-steam, two-guitar feedback fests that dominate the Boston scene. Most of the audience expected something faster, and there wasn't much dancing at first. After a few songs, however, the people in front started to wake up, and pretty soon flailing bodies were catapulting skyward, over the heads of the frenzied throng, and back down to almost certain death under hundreds of stomping feet.

Camper Van Beethoven has a very eclectic sound, which means they've stolen a really tremendous amount of their material from a lot of different sources. They played a waltz, and I heard a few bars of Ringo Starr's "Photograph" at the end of one song.

Their obligatory rendition of "Take the Skinheads Bowling" was short, but most of the tunes lasted about ten minutes apiece. The instrumental parts frequently included a reggae back beat, a 60s surf guitar, and some kind of demented eastern European folk fiddle. In this sense the music was intelligent, even though I still couldn't understand most of the words. During their second encore, I even saw one of the cops nodding his head.

Big Dipper has a brand new album out, although they never said what it's called; buy it if you like their brand of music. Camper Van Beethoven has several albums out, and you can buy them no matter what kind of music you like; as the guy on the spaghetti sauce commercial says, "it's in there."

Art and reason

When Mark and I decided to spend the weekend at his mother's house, I never imagined I would be walking into a mouse's nightmare. There were cats everywhere.

Cat plaques, cat statues, cat clocks, even a cat mat. I couldn't begin to duplicate her collection of kitty litter if I spent a year at a garage sale. Conspicuously absent, however, was a real cat. Strange, I thought, and began to fear that a weekend with cat woman could be a lot less than purr-fect.

But then she came home, and Mark introduced her. She was dressed surprisingly well—no leopard pants. In fact, you could say she was the cat's meow, but I'd rather not.

She offered me a cup of Dutch Chocolate Mint. Now that was something I could relate to. Then she brought it out in the most beautiful, distinctly unfeline china I'd ever seen. As we sipped, I found out that Mrs. Campbell has my same weakness for chocolate, loves the theater as much as I do, but, incredibly, never saw "Cats." So Mark and I are taking her next month.

Belgian ballet troupe to perform at FAC

Belgium's preeminent ballet company The Royal Ballet of Flanders will perform at the UMass Fine Arts Center Concert Hall this Wednesday at 8 p.m.

Under the artistic direction of Robert Denvers, the company will perform "Variations" choreographed by Violette Verdy with music by Brahms; "Go! Said Max" choreographed by Lynne Taylor Corbett, music by R. Maczynski; "Symphony in D"choreographed by Jiri Kylian, music by Haydn and "Don Quixote, Act III" choreographed by Rudolf Nureyev with music by Ludwig Minkus.

It took the Minutewomen over 24 minutes to break UNH goaltender Stacey Gaudette, who registered 10 saves for the afternoon

"We knew we had to be persistent because Stacey is an excellent goaltender, so we had to keep the pressure on and stay cool," Hixon said.

Senior co-captain Pam Bustin let a rolling shot go from about five feet outside the circle. It appeared to be an easy save for Gaudette, but the ball skidded off her foot and into the goal to give UMass a 1-0 lead at 24:28 of the first half "Once we got one, we relaxed a little bit," Hixon said. "I felt we played with a little more poise."

That's how the score stood after the first half. UMass senior goalie Cindy Cox had an easy half, only having to make one save with the defense limiting the Wildcats to two shots.

But the second half was a different story as the Wildcats offense started to come alive. But unfortunately for UNH, its offense did not wake up until the Minutewomen were up 3-0.

UMass upped its lead to 2-0 at 17:34 of the second half when junior Bernadette Martel hit freshman Dawn Trumbauer who slid the ball past Gaudette.

Less than two minutes later, senior co-captain Ruth Vasapolli picked up a loose ball off a Gaudette save and tucked it home at 19:29, extending the UMass lead to 3-0.

But after that, UMass started to get a little too comfortable with its lead and UNH took advantage by testing Cox a number of times and drawing two penalty corners down the stretch.

Cox was forced to make six saves in the second half but just missed wrapping up her 11th save of the season when UNH sophomore forward Liz Brickley picked up a loose ball in front of the net and rifled it past Cox with 18 seconds left in the game to cut UMass' lead to 3-1.

The Wildcats have been struggling, having lost seven of its first 10 games and tying one. Included in that record is a 2-1 loss to Dartmouth College, who UMass will play tomorrow at Hanover, NH.

Rudy felt that the work of Powers and front linemate Beth Roundtree was the key.

"The game was won by the extra work of the front runners," Rudy said. "They were such a better factor [yesterday]. They were positive with their runs and they made them earlier.

UMass had taken a 2-0 lead early in the second half. A miscommunication in the backfield gave the Minutewomen an own goal and a 1-0 lead at halftime. They then made it 2-0 10 minutes into the second half as Becky Bonzano served the ball from midfield down the left side to Cooper. The senior back drove deep and dished inside to Roundtree who had an open shot into the right side of the net.

The Pack rallied with a pair of goals in three minutes, as sweeper Linda Hamilton drilled a 40-yarder just under the crossbar, and then set up forward Charmaine Hooper in the box for the tying goal with 16:10 to play. Such a rally could have deflated the Minutewomen but they weren't ready to come away from this trip empty-handed after the tough loss on Saturday.

In that game, the Minutewomen found out exactly why the the Tarheels are the top-ranked team in the country. UMass went into Fetzer Field in Chapel Hill looking to hand the Lady Tar Heels their first home loss ever. And for about 20 minutes, it appeared as if the Minutewomen were ready to do just that.

UMass played even to better than UNC early on but weren't able to pressure Tarheel goalkeeper Merridee Prost. Then the Tarheels scored and tide shifted drastically.

North Carolina took over possession deep in its own zone and drove upfield. Sweeper Carla Werden drove toward the box and dished off to forward Julie Guarnotta. Guarnotta cut back from the right flank and drove a shot that found the lower left corner of the net.

The goal came on Carolina's first shot of the game. The Tarheels would get only seven shots overall and were outcornered by the Minutemen 4-1, but made the most of every chance thay got.

After the first goal, UNC started to take control. With just over 10 minutes to play in teh half, the Heels got a break. As midfielder Shannon Higgins broke toward the net and was tripped in the box, giving the team a penalty kick. UMass goalie Carla DeSantis twice stopped the shot but the official ruled that she was moving before the ball was hit. On the third shot, Lori Henry got the ball past DeSantis into the top left side.

Less then two minutes later, the Tarheels rubbed it in a little more as Guarnotta scored her second goal, taking a long serven into the box in a crowd a flipping it into the right side to make it 3-0.

By this point, North Carolina was all over the place, playing aggressive defense and hustling to every ball. They were clearly outplaying the Minutewomen.

The final goal came with 28:45 left as freshman Chris Huston, playing in place of injured star forward Wendy Gebauer, took a throw-in and knocked it over a challenging DeSantis and into the net.

The University of Massachusetts men's basketball team will hold an open tryout for those interested in playing for the Minutemen. It will be tomorrow at 8:30 p.m. in the Curry Hicks Cage.

Things started to get really sticky as UMass could not close the match with four opportunities. Meanwhile, WVU patiently stockpiled points until it was a slim 14-13 lead for the home team. Juliet Primer's smash off the block ended a 3-point run for WVU and the match unexpectedly ended on a Scott kill error.

UMass broke a close game in the first by striking with seven points until it reached 14-7. With their backs to the wall, West Virginia didn't hesitate to go to their strength, middle blocker Lisa Scott. Her kill made the score 14-10 before a double block by Juliet Primer and Anne Marie Larese ended the game.

The Mountaineers blitzkrieged UMass in the second as West Virginia served extremely well and thus stalled the UMass offense.

"That's what this game is all about", UMass coach Carol Ford said. "If you can't dig and pass, you can't run your offense." UMass pulled it together at 13-3, but it was too little, too late.

In the third game, it was simply textbook power volleyball. Setter Tracey Thompson had plenty of time to run over her options: to the middle with Scott or to the outside with Miller. Scott finished with 23 kills and Miller had a spectacular night as well, tallying up 19 kills (as opposed to only 4 kill errors) for a .326 kill percentage. Miller had to have impressed everyone who showed up with the depth and power of her shots.

After the two Homecoming matches, Ford "obviously happy with the weekend. There's no question that everyone's spirit are high and that they're on Cloud Nine."

■ football loses conference game to UConn

"That was a 14-point swing, and it killed us," Palazzi said.

The Huskies rode their momentum into the second half, and a DeGennaro-to-Glenn Antrum touchdown pass, and a pair of Boothe touchdowns put the game out of reach.

"The offensive line played well, Boothe ran hard, and everyone caught well," Jackson said. "That was enough."

UMass got it's other touchdown on a 1-yard leap by Kevin Smellie late in the third quarter. The offense couldn't get going, as the UConn defense pressured Palazzi and picked off four passes in the second half.

"I thought I was reading the defense well," Palazzi said. "The later interceptions came because we were trying to make something happen."

They couldn't make it happen, but the conference picture remains largely unchanged.

"Nothing's really changed in the conference," Jackson said. "But the win brings us back to 2-2 and we'll try like hell to finish the season with two conference losses."

And UMass will try like hell not to.

"One loss doesn't make a season," Reid said. "This team knows it can't think about wins and losses. We have to keep an even keel. But we have work to do, and we'll find out whether we can come back."

Water polo wins two at Amherst

By DENNIS MADSEN
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's water polo team improved its record to 8-6 with a pair of wins this weekend at Amherst College.

They started off Friday night with a rematch with the host team, Amherst, and dominated for the first three quarters.

UMass coach Russ Yarworth said, "The game came out like I expected. [Amherst] came back when I started playing everybody."

In the first quarter UMass started out with two quick goals and, after a man-up (power play) score by Amherst, the Minutemen picked up two more, including a nice long-range shot into the corner by freshman Scott DeLuca. The scoring seesawed in the second quarter with the highlight being the goaltending by junior goalie Peter Koback.

At the half it was 7-3, UMass.

The Minutemen continued to run the show in the second half until Amherst started a small comeback with a pair of quick goals 48 seconds into the fourth period. UMass answered with a man-up goal to stifle the drive and ended up winning 12-9.

The next game, Saturday night against Boston College, proved to be a little tougher test.

"It was a fair game," Yarworth said, "but we're still not putting a team away. UMass led 3-0 at the end of the first quarter, 5-3 at the half and 8-3 at one point in the third quarter, aided in part by a pair of beautiful lob shots by sophomore Jon Miller.

However, the Minutemen let the Eagles climb back to within three until freshman Alex Yelensky took a close-in feed from junior G.T. Ladd and fired it in for the point to end the regular scoring. A successful penalty shot by each team finished up the match and UMass took home the victory, 10-6.

"We were a little more consistent," Yarworth said. "We had good defense today and we played a good, physical game overall."

■ men's soccer

UMass controlled play through the rest of the half but was unable to score against an overmatched but unyielding Northeastern defense. The Huskies' resilience broke down in the early goings of the second half, however, and the Minutmen scored twice in the first 10 minutes following intermission to tuck away a 3-0 lead.

Northeastern fullback Todd Rumaner hauled down Cesnek inside the penalty area, and Lawrence capitalized on the ensuing penalty kick to give the Minutemen a two goal bulge. Cesnek, who stands as the reigning penalty kick champion through two months of UMass practice sessions, was passed over on the freebie to protect a strained groin muscle.

"Cesnek was going to have trouble," explained Gettler, "Lawrence is our second choice . . .(Cesnek) will take them if he's healthy."

Hanks picked up the third UMass goal of the afternoon on a freak play. After Halasz had held and then lost a slow roller in front of the net, Anthony redirected the loose ball to Hanks, who poked it into the open net.

Cuhna, a freshman forward, scored the first goal of his UMass career with 23:01 left to play. Taking a feed from McEvoy, Cuhna raced past several Northeastern defenders towards the left side of the net before beating Halasz. Free Kicks: UMass posted a 7-2 record within the quirky confines of Upper Boyden Field this season. . .Northeastern's Tony "Taxi" Dias brought to town the soccer nickname of the year. . .Anthony seems to attract more than his share of abuse on a soccer field. . .Ginzburg's going-away present was a bloody nose and a face full of scratches, donated by Husky forward Todd Campbell on a one-on-one goal saving confrontation late in the contest.

UConn goes home a 35-14 winner

By MATT GERKE
Collegian Staff

The University of Connecticut football team was probably the only group not welcome in Amherst on Homecoming Weekend.

And the Huskies left town the least popular group after beating the University of Massachusetts football team, 35-14, before a crowd of 14,301 at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

Both teams are now 4-2 overall, and UConn is 2-2 in the Yankee Conference. UMass, 3-1 in the conference, is tied for first with Villanova and Delaware. Delaware beat Villanova 10-7 on Saturday.

"There's not too much you can say about a game like this," UMass head coach Jim Reid said.

A few numbers say it well: UMass quarterback Dave Palazzi threw 5 interceptions; his 46 yards on the ground made him the Minutemen's leading rusher; and UMass had the ball inside the Huskies' 14-yard line 6 times and had just 14 points to show for it.

"That was it," Palazzi said. "We didn't take advantage when we had the ball down at their end."

UConn did take advantage of its chances. Sophomore quarterback Matt DeGennaro, who pulled a rib cage muscle last week, was not a definite starter until Saturday morning.

"I didn't know what to expect from DeGennaro," UConn coach Tom Jackson said. "I was surprised, he played great."

DeGennaro, whose offensive line gave him plenty of time to work, completed 22-of-35 passes for 244 yards and 3 touchdowns, and kept the UMass secondary guessing all afternoon.

"At the beginning of the game, I felt good about the defense," Reid said. "I felt like they were going to have a good game."

But DeGennaro picked the UMass defense apart.

"He is very accurate whether he's hurt or not," said UMass cornerback Jerome Bledsoe. "We couldn't get drops because of [UConn's] delays. And the underneath passes killed us."

DeGennaro's success was helped by the production of tailback George Boothe, who rushed for 132 yards and two touchdowns. The pair combined on the first touchdown of the game, which occurred during a bizarre first quarter.

On their second drive of the day, the Huskies moved the ball to the UMass 29-yard line. At that point, DeGennaro lofted a pass to Boothe down the left sideline.

Boothe, who had stepped out of bounds on his pass route, caught the ball and fell into the end zone. The officials ruled Boothe had been pushed out of bounds by a UMass defender, so the touchdown stood and UConn led 7-0.

On the ensuing kickoff, UConn kicker Rob Moons drilled the ball off Al Pogarain, one of the front men in the return formation. Moons recovered the ball himself and the Huskies had the ball on their 44.

"We made big plays all day," Jackson said.

The UMass defense held on three plays, and two drives later, the offense tied the score. The rushing of fullbacks Steve Olson and Duncan MacRae led the Minutemen to the 1-yard line, where MacRae slammed in for the score. Silvio Bonvini's extra point made it 7-7.

UMass then had a chance to take the lead when it attempted a fake field goal on a fourth-and-3 from the UConn 7. Palazzi, the holder, took the ball and ran around left end to the 2, but fumbled, and the Huskies recovered.

UConn marched downfield and DeGennaro hit Rob Meers for a 3-yard touchdown pass.

So UMass not only lost a probable 7 points but watched the Huskies turn the mistake into 7 points of their own.

Volleyball shines with a pair of A-10 wins

By RIC SETO
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts volleyball team swept a pair of Atlantic-10 Conference games at Totman Gym, edging West Virginia in a knock-em-sock-em Friday night fight (15-10, 7-15, 10-15, 15-12, 15-13) and then whitewashing Duquesne in three straight (15-5, 15-10, 15-4) the next day. The Minutewomen improve to 13-2 overall and 2-2 in the A-10. In the Duquesne game, it was evident that the Dutchesses would not be a match for UMass, as Duquesne had a problem returning fairly easy serves. The miscommunication in the back row helped UMass bolt out to a 5-0 lead. The problems were more extensive, affecting the passing, and thus Duquesne had no semblance of a consistent offensive set.

The third game was a nice showcase for the three freshmen on the team, as Kelly Ramsey, Susan DiClemente, and Rebecca Plimpton all saw playing time. DiClemente and Ramsey's serving helped UMass jump out to a 6-1 advantage and the Minutewomen never looked back.

The West Virginia game Friday night was a totally different story. After a 2-2 deadlock, the two teams were forced to play a deciding fifth game.

WVU started with dinks by Michelle Miller and Tracey Thompson to take an early 4-1 lead. The key juncture followed with Mass running off 7 unanswered points behind the serving of Juliet Primer. Barbara Meehan and Julia Smith combined, like they did all night, for block assists to send back Miller's smash back, setter Karen Ferguson pulled off her 4th-set dink, and then Ferguson won a tap exchange at the net to tie it at 4-4. The Ferguson-to-Meehan connection on a short set in the middle gave the Minutewomen a lead they would never relinquish and WV quickly called time out.

WVU pulled back within 8-6 until Meehan put away another short set for sideout. After several sideouts, UMass put on another three- point spurt before West Virginia called time out again. What was working for WVU - serving, passing, and killing - all night just fell apart. Their senior co-captain and last week's A-10 Player-of-the-Week, Lisa Scott, made a rare kill error, combined with a Julia Smith kill ran the score up to 13-7. Smith came through in the clutch once again, as her kill down the line set up game and match point. In the critical fourth game, her dink at 14-12 gave the Minutewomen sideout, effectively stopping a WV comeback. Spurred on by the homecrowd and feeling the adrenalin, Ferguson set it to the hot man and Smith evened things up at two games apiece.

Women's soccer splits in N.C.

By JIM CLARK
Collegian Staff

RALEIGH, N.C. — After dropping a 4-0 game to the top-ranked University of North Carolina on Saturday, the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team had something to prove — both to themselves and to the rest of the soccer world.

The unfortunate victim was second-ranked North Carolina State, which didn't help its own cause by showing the Minutewomen absolutely no respect. UMass took it all out on the Wolfpack for a 3-2 win yesterday.

The Minutewomen had to work hard for the win against a tough team. They watched the Pack rally from a 2-0 deficit to tie it with 16 minutes left, but the "Reds" refused to let down.

"I don't think this team was willing to take two losses," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "This is a great victory."

"We came to play. We didn't want to go home with two losses," midfielder April Kater said. "We had something to prove to ourselves."

It was Kater who got the winning goal with 5:30 left on a great set-up from forward Michelle Powers. Powers took a pass from Sue Cooper and served it over a pair of defenders to a streaking Kater in the box. Kater cut in from the right flank and drilled it past NC State goalkeeper Lindsay Brecher into the left side.

Men's soccer beats Huskies, 4-0

By SAM SILVERSTEIN
Collegian Staff

On the day in which the four seniors on the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team bid adieu to Upper Boyden Field, it was the fresh faces on the UMass squad that led the Minutemen to a 4-0 win over Northeastern.

Seniors Bret Blanton, Mike Mugavero, Sam Ginzburg and Mike McCormick were honored before the game for their contributions to the program. But freshmen Dan Lawrence, Brett Anthony and Ray Cuhna hogged the limelight with game-breaking performances.

Saturday's contest also marked the end of a brutal scheduling stretch that saw the Minutemen (8-6) play seven games in fourteen days. Coach Jeff Gettler's squad will now have a full week's rest before visiting Boston College where they'll pound the astroturf that adorns the house that Flutie built.

"We have to build on these games, and see if we can put some wins together, especially since were going on the road now," said Gettler.

Anthony jump-started the Minutemen out to 1-0 lead with just 11:31 elapsed in the first half. UMass forward Steve Cesnek settled a bouncing ball at midfield onto the foot of Pete McEvoy, who found Anthony streaking all alone past the Husky defense. Anthony took three strides to catch up to the ball, then beat oncoming Northeastern goalkeeper John Halasz with a cue shot into the lower left corner of the net.

Field hockey tops UNH, 3-1

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

When a team loses one of its starters, there is always cause for concern coming into a game, unless of course you have a bench that is as deep as the one that the University of Massachusetts field hockey team has.

The Minutewomen were without the services of sophomore defender Kerri Fagan this weekend when they played the University of New Hampshire but still came away with a 3-1 victory at Totman Field.

The Minutewomen came into the game as the No. 3 team in the country by the NCAA and the top-ranked team in New England. The win raises their record to 12-1-1.

Fagan sat out Saturday's game with a sprained back, so in stepped sophomore Lisa Berardinelli and senior Kathy Derwin to take up the slack.

Berardinelli has not seen much action for UMass over her two years but with Fagan out, she was given the start by UMass coach Pam Hixon and got the job done in a big game.

"She started the Fairfield game but this was her first start under what I would consider any kind of pressure and I thought she did OK," Hixon said. "I thought that Kathy Derwin gave us a great spark too. I think she played as well today as she played in Fairfield."

The attack, however, was healthy, though it was not quite as explosive as it has been all season.

Selectmen discuss proposed voting place, hockey arena for UMass

By LISA JOHNSON
Collegian Correspondent

Amherst Selectmen last night postponed their decision to support the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association's attempt to put a polling station on campus for the November elections.

Michael Greiner, the chair of the Student Government Association Public Policy Committee, requested a letter of support from selectmen and for their help to work with University administration.

"The main thing we should be thinking about is getting the students out to vote," said Greiner. "It should be a joint effort between the town, the University's administration and the SGA."

As it stands now, registered voters living on campus will have to travel to downtown Amherst to vote. Greiner said the extra effort to vote will result in a lower voter turn out for the campus.

Greiner said he and the SGA have been working with UMass administration to try to find a place on or near campus where the students could vote.

"I'm looking for a philosophical statement that the town opposes (having the polling sites so far from campus)," said Greiner.

Members of the board argued there could be problems in staffing a poll on campus and it could be difficult for Amherst residents living in Precinct 10 to reach an on-campus polling site.

Selectman James Torrey suggested creating two polling sites in Precinct 10, one on-campus and one off. He said there could be a problem with staffing, however. Greiner said he had spoken with several people in the SGA who had already volunteered to work in the polling station, and didn't think it would be a problem.

"UMass has dozens of buildings they could use, I don't see why we can't find the space," said Greiner.

Greiner also asked the board to support the SGA on an upcoming issue against the building of the proposed hockey arena.

Greiner said he wasn't against the building going up, but against the student fees that would be collected to pay for it.

"Student fees have gone up $600 this year and I know a lot of people who have dropped out of school because of it," Greiner said. "The arena will cost students an additional $100 a year and many students would never use the complex.

"Will the hockey team provide education for all?" Greiner asked. "I'd lve to see the town take a stand on that."

A move to try to stop student funding of the arena will be made at the next SGA meeting, Greiner said, "and I have no doubt that it will pass unanimously against charging a student fee."

In other news, Selectmen supported the Police Building Committee's article for the town to appropriate $4,978,293 for the construction of new police facilities at the intersection of Main and Churchill streets. The article will be voted on at town meeting which begins Nov. 9.

Selectmen approved the tax rate for the next year. Rates are going up 50 cents, from $12 to $12.50. It is a flat rate affecting all zoning districts. The average home owner can expect a 9 to 10 percent increase over last year's bill, said Principal Assessor Robert S. Anderson.

Former BKO house sold to real estate developer

The former house of the Beta Kappa Phi fraternity, which was shut down last spring, has been sold to a real estate developer.

By GEORGE FRANCY
Collegian Staff

The former home of Beta Kappa Phi fraternity has been sold for $625,000 to a real estate company which plans to rent the house to another fraternity or sorority, a spokesman for the company said yesterday.

The house, at the corner of Phillips and North Pleasant Sts., was sold on Oct. 5 to Aspen Square Management of Springfield, according to Tom Albert, director of BKO's corporation. The corporation purchased the building on a foreclosure in 1973 for around $325,000, Albert said.

Albert said he estimates the house to need about $200,000 worth of repairs before it can be occupied again. The building was condemned by the Amherst Board of Health over the summer.

"I was told it was going to become a rooming house, and I'd be very surprised if it is used for that," Albert said. "I think there are higher and better uses for it." He said offices, apartments or residential condominiums were possibilities for the structure.

"There were a number of fraternities and sororities that asked to see the house, but none were able to carry the freight," he said.

"It's our intent to keep it as a fraternity," said Fred Anthony, operating officer for Aspen Square Management. Anthony would not reveal the fraternities and/or sororities that were interested in the building.

"I think we're limited by the zoning," Anthony said. He said the proximity to other fraternities and sororities would make it hard to convert the building for other purposes.

"We're in the process of renovating, but we really haven't come up with a price yet," he said. Anthony also could not give an estimate as to when the renovation would be complete. "Ideally, we'd like to have someone in there for next semester," he said.

WORLD/NATION

Candidates continue to battle as election day draws closer

(AP)– Attacking vigorously with just over three weeks to the election, George Bush said yesterday his Democratic rival should "stop running down our defenses," while Michael Dukakis said Bush doesn't care enough about people to protect them from nuclear-poisoned water.

Far from conceding the presidential race is over, despite polls showing Bush with a lead, the two contenders were out campaigning early and hard as the week began.

Dukakis, seeking votes in Ohio, one of the states it is now clear he must win to have a chance on Election Day, said that Bush as vice president has "sat on his hands while America's industrial heartland has been fighting for its life."

"Here in Ohio you've lost thousands of manufacturing jobs.

And just last week we learned that we had more imports coming into the United States in August than in any month in history," Dukakis said.

He also said that while Bush talks about "a kinder, gentler nation," his record contradicts that message.

"His record tells the people of Ohio, "We don't care enough about you to protect you form the nuclear weapons facilities that are poisoning your water and threatening the safety of your workers," Dukakis said,

Bush, meanwhile, resumed his attack on Dukakis as weak on defense.

In remarks prepared for delivery at a Denver defense plan, Bush said Dukakis is "trying desperately to jump into the mainstream" my talking of a need to modernize land-based defenses.

"But there is strong reason to doubt that he would do it, especially when it comes to modernizing our land-based missiles," he said.

Bush added, "It's time the liberal governor stopped spreading what I'll call charitably misinformation about the state of our forces. It's not 1980 any more. Our divisional war fighting capabilities have improved by an average of 60 percent since 1980."

A day earlier, Bush cautioned against overconfidence and promised to stick to his campaign curse, while Dukakis, facing an uphill struggle in the presidential race, nevertheless predicted victory on Election Day.

Libel law changes proposed

WASHINGTON (AP) — A major study of libel laws yesterday recommended sweeping changes designed to resolve disputes quickly through "no fault" trials deciding the truth of disputed statements.

No damages would be awarded in such trials.

The changes are proposed by the Washington-based Annenberg Washington Program of Northwestern University in Evanston, Ill., after a study begun last winter by 11 lawyers, judges, journalists and others.

"Libel suits tend to drag on interminably, are enormously costly for both sides and very seldom clearly resolve what ought to be the heart of the matter: the truth of falsity of what was published." said the report of the Libel Reform Project.

A major change from current law in the proposal would be elimination of the requirement that public figures suing for libel prove that defamatory statements about them were published with "actual malice," that is, with knowledge that they were false or within "reckless disregard" of whether they were false or not.

PM threatens retaliation

JERUSALEM (AP) — Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir vowed that "nothing will remain" of Palestinians who carry out threats to use firearms in their uprising against Israel.

Shamir, the head of the right wing Likud bloc, made the remark Sunday night to more than 2,000 supporters in the southern working class town of Sderot, according to four Israeli news dailies.

Ahimeir said Shamir responded to Arab news reports that Hani el Hassan, an aide to PLO Chief Yasser Arafat, has threatened that Palestinians would switch to using firearms against Israel if Shamir is reelected premier in the Now. 1 elections.

If the Arabs of Judea, Samaria and Gaza start fighting the army with firearms, nothing will remain of those terrorists, and there is no doubt that an end will come to the intefadeh," Shamir said, according to Ahimeir.

Judea and Samaria are the Israeli names for the occupied West Bank, scene of much of the violence during the 10-month "intefadeh," or Arab uprising.

Defense Minister Yitzhak Rabin also told the Cabinet on Sunday that if firearms were used by Palestinians "they will meet an immediate response with firearms," the Haaretz daily said.

So far Palestinians have primarily confronted Israeli troops and civilians with stones, bottles and firebombs. Throughout the rebellion there have been five grenade attacks and 59 involving homemade bombs in Gaza, the army said.

However, more firearms have been used by Palestinians in recent days, including two grenades hurled at army vehicles in Gaza last week, injuring two soldiers.

Since the uprising began Dec. 8, 229 Palestinians and six Israelis have died and about 7,000 Palestinians have been wounded.

The latest death occurred Sunday when an 18-year-old Palestinian died of head wounds sustained during a clash with troops last week.

Smeal to speak on women in leadership

Cites lack of representation on campuses

By JANINE WARNER
Collegian Staff

The only way women will achieve equality, according to Ellie Smeal, president of The Fund For the Feminist Majority, is for women to get elected to powerful positions at all levels of government.

Smeal, who served a two-year term as president of the National Organization for Women, will be a guest lecturer in the Student Union Ballroom tonight, encouraging women to run for public office and to assume leadership roles on college campuses.

More than half the students on any college campus are now women, but they're still not equally represented, Smeal said.

In a survey of 50 public, private, and religious colleges, The Fund For the Feminist Majority found that while 53 percent of undergraduate students are women, only eight of their student governments are 50 percent women.

Among faculty and administrators the survey showed only 11 percent of tenured college professors and 10 percent of college and university presidents are women. And 38 percent of those presidents were at all-female universities.

"Women need to learn how discriminatory college campuses are," Smeal said. "Everywhere we go people are surprised at the small percentages."

The imbalance of representation greatly hurts women students, she said. "There is always enough money for AstroTurf, but we have to fight for safety lighting and emergency phones." Changing that inequality is the goal of the Campus Campaign, Smeal said. "We're inspiring women to go for leadership positions. We're encouraging students interested in public issues to not only think about working for non-profit organizations but to run for public office."

Psych professor will discuss hearing development in infants

Professor of Psychology Rachel K. Clifton will give a lecture on "The Development of the Auditory System in Human Infants," at 8 p.m. Thursday in Bowker Auditorium.

Clifton will also be awarded the Chancellor's Medal for outstanding service to the University of Massachusetts.

Clifton will discuss how recent research of infant hearing led to greater general understanding of both the auditory system and brain development.

She will discuss her research about what newborn infants hear and their use of early hearing. Research conducted in the past two decades shows newborns have both acute and sophisticated senses, according to Clifton.

After coming to UMass in 1968, Clifton has concentrated her work on the development of perceptual and cognitive abilities in infants.

Her research has been supported by grants from the National Institute of Child Health and Human Development, the March of Dimes, the National Science Foundation and the National Institutes of Health.

A Research Scientist Award from the National Institute of Mental Health in 1981 relieved her from teaching duties and allowed her to concentrate on research.

Clifton received her B.A. in elementary education from Berea College and her M.A. and Ph.D. in child psychology from the University of Minnesota.

Affirmative Action investigating slur

The investigation of an upper level physical plant employee is now entirely in the hands of the University of Massachusetts Affirmative Action office.

Physical Plant Director Roger Cherewatti, who initiated the investigation, said he handed the investigation over to Affirmative Action because, "in cases like this, they are the experts."

The investigation stems from a Oct. 5 radio broadcast made on physical plant frequency one, a frequency normally reserved for supervisors and foremen. The broadcast was derogatory to blacks, according to sources.

Sources at the physical plant have identified the voice, but University officials have not been able to confirm who the culprit is because the matter is still under investigation.

Tim Chrissman, a carpenter for Aspen, said he was in the process of estimating repairs the house would need, but would give no dollar figure for the repairs.

"All I can tell you is that we're going to completely redo the house," Chrissman said. He said the repairs would include new paint and landscaping, walls, windows, and a new heating system. "The destruction here was caused by people having a good time," he said.

BKO lost it's recognition as a fraternity by the University last semester after it was raided by police. In the raid, police made several arrests, seizing 16 full kegs, 80 empty kegs and an ounce and a half of cocaine.

Carlene Riccelli, director of Greek Affairs, said she had received no reapplication from former members of the fraternity. Albert said the fraternity will reapply, but not in the near future.

"Generally the Office of Greek Affairs requires a certain amount of time off-campus [for fraternities that have lost their recognition]," Riccelli said.

She said she had been asked to refer people interested in the house to Anthony.

Richard Howland, an Amherst attorney who represented several members of the fraternity arrested in the raid, said the case was not over, but would not comment on the status of the case.

The Dean of Students office also would not reveal if disciplinary action was being sought against the members of the fraternity.

Members of the former fraternity could not be reached for comment.

GOING IN FOR THE KILL — The residents of the seventh floor of Grayson Residence Hall took part in the Orchard Hill volleyball tournament Saturday.

State unveils new farm plan

BOSTON (AP) — Massachusetts officials, buoyed by the success of state efforts to stabilize the commonwealth's farm economy yesterday unveiled a plan calling for further farmland preservation and farm startups in the next five years.

"We have worked hard to allow agriculture to enjoy a resurgence in Massachusetts and this new report offers a blueprint for future growth," Gov. Michael S. Dukakis said in a statement.

Environmental Affairs Secretary James Hoyte and Agriculture Commissioner Gus Schumacher Jr., during a news conference at Boston City Hall farmer's market, unveiled the 81-page report on the state's food and farm policy. The paper was the product of a task force of legislators, farmers, bankers, and other industry and administration officials.

The reports's recommendations build on proposals advanced by the Dukakis administration in 1976 that have led to successful farm preservation and reduced pesticide initiatives.

"What we are trying to do now is to begin to look forward to what is going to be happening in the next five years," Schumacher said. "How do we position our food system, which is a $16 billion industry in Massachusetts, for the changes in the 1990's? And how will our farmers and food processors live within that food system?"

In the mid-1970's, when agriculture was flourishing elsewhere in the nation, agriculture in Massachusetts and throughout the Northeast was skidding downward. According to the report, the state's acreage in farming fell from 2 million acres at the end of World war II to less than 600,000. And the number of farms dropped from 35,000 to less that 6,000.

But the 1976 farm policy, keyed on state-supported agricultural development and marketing, has stabilized the situation, officials said. In fact, Schumacher said, there were actually 100 farms begun in the state this past year, bringing the total to 6,100. Most of them are small operations involved in vegetables, fruits or house plants.

Under a 10-year farmland preservation program, the state has spent $50 million buying the development rights to 21,586 acres on 234 farms. A recently passed $35 million supplement to the program aims to bring the total to 32,000 acres on 350 farms. The new farm policy aims even higher, to 40,000 acres on some 400 farms by 1993.

Acknowledging there is not enough state money "to buy back all the farms," Schumacher said the new policy will try to encourage participation by towns and cities to preserve farmland through zoning changes.

Other objectives of the policy aim to reduce the use of pesticides by 50 percent by 1993 through tougher chemical controls and development of pest-resistent plants; further agricultural leasing of state-owned land; and continued support for expansion of food processing and marketing of Massachusetts products.

Haiti coup foiled

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti (AP) — The military government said yesterday it has foiled an attempted coup against President Lt. Gen. Prosper Avril by two military officers.

Radio Soleil said "several soldiers were wounded" and 30 soldiers were arrested in the coup attempt early Sunday. It have no further details.

Government spokesman Frantz Lubin said the coup was led by Sgt. Patrick Frantz Bochard, who headed a government lottery, and former Col. Samuel Jeremie, who escaped from prison following the Sept. 17 coup that brought Avril to power.

"Certain other officers have been discharged," Lubin said.

"They had maneuvered to stage a coup against the military government of Lt. Gen. Proseper Avril."

On Sept. 17, rank-and-file soldiers ousted Haitian ruler Lt. Gen. Henri Namphy and installed Avril as president.

Bush as president brings a nightmarish scenario

It is a crisp November evening. In the distance you hear a low but growing rumble. You walk over to your window and open it, immediately get a cool breeze blown in your face. Sticking your head out the window, you realize that it not rumbling you hear but cheering.

Meredith O'Brien

Quickly, you rush to your neighbor's to ask him if he knows what is happening. As you open the door you hear more cheering.

"What's going on?" you ask impatiently.

Your neighbor looks at you strangely and then yells, "Bush has been elected!! Where have you been?"

We have not gotten to the frightening part yet.

The scene shifts. It is March 1989 — another crisp evening. You are munching on a bag of Doritos in front of the television while you watch the national news. You feel cozy, warm, and contented as you pull the afgan over your feet and lay back to see how much your wonderful country is prospering.

The cameral focuses on the anchorman. Instead of the usual neat and professional appearance he usually projects, he looks quite distraught and uncomfortable. You shift in your seat.

The anchorman proceeds to tell you that the Iran-Contral hearings (that had been strategically postponed until after the election) have revealed that President Bush was deeply involved in the scandal. He tells you that Bush had been an advisor and knew of everything that transpired in the illegal, covert operation.

Your jaw drops.

He continues to say that in light of the new developments, the House is considering impeachment proceedings.

Time lapses, it is now a warm April evening and you have tried to forget about the "corrupt" government and ignore the whole thing. "There will always be corrupt politicians," you tell yourself. "This will blow over and President Bush will bring us the prosperity of the Reagan administration."

Your phone rings. It is your brother calling to ask what you two are going to do for your parents' anniversary. Suddenly he drops the phone in mid-sentence and screams.

"What's going on?" you yell into the receiver.

He picks up the phone. "Quick, turn on the television!" You hang up and flick on the set. There sits your familiar anchorman. He looks nervous while he anxiously informs you that President Bush has resigned in the face of probable impeachment. Vice-president Quayle has just been sworn in as President Quayle.

Outside of your window you hear a low rumble. Thrusting your head outside, you discover that what your hear isn't rumbling, but screaming. You rush out the door to talk to your neighbor. When you open the door you see him with his head in his hands.

He looks up at you desperately. "It's all over. . .President Quayle! Hell revisited! I'm moving to Canada."

Now that's the scary part.

Scenarios like this would be laughable if we knew what actually happened in the Iran-Contra scandal. Bush has refused to answer any inquiries about his involvement. The claim that Bush knew nothing of it is ridiculous — an ex-CIA director? He claims the press badgers him. He wouldn't be if he would just answer the questions. Why won't he answer? Does he have something to hide? Would the Republican party have been stupid enough to nominate him if they knew he was involved?

It is very important that George Bush settle the issue once and for all by just honestly answering the questions. This may be an exaggerated scenario, but it is plausible. This possible nightmare will remain until we find out the truth.

But will it be too late?

Meredith O'Brien is a Collegian columnist

Illinois? Where's that?

I am sure you all have read Ann Landers' columns about test results showing American kids know nothing about world geography, or even the geography of the United States. I always thought those had to be exaggerated, but ever since I left Illinois to attend the University of Massachusetts, I have begun to realize how very realistic those statistics probably were.

These are some of the responses I received from UMass students after saying I was from Illinois:

"I don't know exactly where that is, but I know it's somewhere west of here." We're in Massachusetts — everything is west of us.

"Oh, one of those 'I' states — Indiana, Illinois, Ohio . . ." This person not only doesn't know his geography, he still needs to work on his alphabet.

"I don't know where anything on the other side of the Mississippi is." Excuse me, but you don't even know where the Mississippi is, since both states are on the same side of it.

"What's in Illinois? Anything besides cornfields?"

I respond: "Have you ever heard of Chicago?"

"Oh, I knew that was out there somewhere, I just didn't know exactly where." Yet I'm expected to know every town in Massachusetts.

I was once asked why we would have pony rides at a fair — didn't we all have horses of our own anyway? Sure, and we all have pet cows that sleep at the foot of our bed every night, too.

I don't know if this is typical all over the United States, or just in New England, but I personally was appalled at their ignorance. People here are under the impression that New England is the center of the Universe and therefore pay no attention to any of those "lesser" states out in the Midwest. When I go home and tell people that I go to school in Massachusetts, their reaction is "Wow! That's neat! What's it like there?"

When I have taken friends home with me, the response they get when mentioning their trip to Illinois is "What the hell would you want to go out there for?" So, for anyone who might be interested in learning something, I will give you a short lesson on Illinois.

Area-wise, Illinois is approximately seven times larger than Massachusetts. Chicago is the third largest city in the United States, with eight million people living in the city and its suburbs. The weather is almost the same as here, except that we get tornadoes instead of hurricanes. In the Midwest, most people have such a mixed heritage that many of the kids wouldn't know their ancestors' nationality if they were asked. Most important, the 's' on the end of Illinois is not pronounced. Ever!

A pen, a pen, my kingdom for a pen

Am I having fun yet?

With music blaring in the background, the smell of pot in the air, and an air of alcohol around this multi-level home, I waded ever-so-carefully to my little spot in the corner.

David R. Mark

Near the vent.

I came not so much to party but to observe. I would not drink.

Of course, I wasn't in a position to force my way through the crowd around the keg.

But as it was, I would not be tempted. I would not drink.

Want a drink?

No thanks. I'm fine.

You sure?

Yep, positive. Just listening to the music.

Well, all right.

He walked away.

The band continued playing. I felt like a Nancy Reagan commercial. Just say no and all that crap.

The point is I'm not as much fun when I drink.

I'm silly.

I'm boring.

You wanna drink?

No. I'm just listening to the band. Thanks.

You can have one.

I know. Thanks, but I'll pass.

Who're you — F—ing Nancy Reagan?

Nephew.

Eh. Don't you go away. I'll be back.

Gosh, thanks. And thanks for breathing on me.

I put my face closer to the vent.

Do drinking and smoking and partying have to go hand in hand in hand? It's come to the point that I don't like to go to big parties.

Think about it. You can't talk to someone over the noise and the music. You can't sit down because all the seats are taken. You can't move around because there's too many people in every room already. You can hardly get a beer, because the line is too long, and you can hardly breathe, because of the cigarettes, pipes of varied kinds, and other less-legal substances that take up the air.

So why do I go? Well, what else am I to do? I've seen most of the major movies, I don't want to watch reruns on TV. There aren't any nighttime sporting events I want to go to. I don't have a car, which means there's no leaving the immediate area, and my family doesn't live in the area, which means there's no going home. The campus, famed for providing so much, doesn't really provide logical alternative entertainment to someone too young to drink, but too old for sock hops.

Actually, a sock hop wouldn't be too bad these days.

We wanna get another keg. We nominate you to carry it, big guy.

I don't want to help you.

Ah, c'mon big guy. Help get the beer.

No.

What are you, a faggot?

Oh, there's a good answer. Who'd you learn logic from, Paul Cameron?

Who?

Just go away.

That's the thing about drunks, potheads, and other varied partygoers who haven't heard of the word control. They think they're interesting, enlightening, humorous.

They're not.

The above conversation has taken place, I wouldn't lie about something so serious. While I think anyone who wants to drink should be allowed, at the same time I can understand why we as a generation are so stereotyped.

I didn't drink. I observed. I observed others make fools of themselves. I observed people throwing up. I observed one particular idiot who couldn't walk — winding up on the ground outside — unconscious. I heard some of the most ridiculous conversation in recent memory. And I observed very few people who I honestly could say looked like they had a good time.

Is it just me? Am I missing out on something?

In other news. . .

George Bush is a card-carrying member of the National Rifle Association. Among the NRA's past causes are opposition to a ban on plastic handguns (a position shared with airplane hijackers) and opposition to a ban on the sale of Teflon bullets, most useful for their ability to pierce protective vests. This may sound like an attempt to tar Bush by association, but that's not really necessary; Bush proudly stood by the NRA in opposing a plastic handgun ban. Why, then, isn't Michael Dukakis talking more about Bush's special-interest problem — slavish devotion to the NRA? Partly because the NRA began a couple of years ago to revamp its image, reversing itself on key issues after its increasingly apparent fanaticism began to alienate supporters. In 1986 it grudgingly accepted a bill outlawing machine-gun sales, and supported a ban on the sale of cop-killer bullets. This year, after a Senate plastic handgun ban had gained unstoppable momentum, the NRA did another backflip and signed on. But a few weeks ago, the NRA reclaimed its customary place on the fringe of American politics with its deft sabotage of the Brady amendment.

The fundamentals of life

Wealth, envy, and families

I've been watching Dukakis lambaste folks who already pay up to half their income in various taxes because he wants to grab even more in the name of social programs. He seems to think the rich are selfish and greedy, that nobody prospers except at the expense of underdogs, so now they ought to give it back.

Rusty Denton

I know it's a popular sentiment, but that attitude is called covetousness, and it's forbidden in the Ten Commandments (check it out, it's the last one). What isn't a sin is to become fabulously wealthy by smarts, honesty, hard work, risk-taking, investments, thriftiness or by inheriting it. Government has no God-given right to take away a person's resources just because elected officials don't think they're being spent charitably enough.

Moreover, the sort of taxation we now have allows have-nots to commandeer what they can't legally steal otherwise. It's taxation without representation; most taxpayers don't like taxes. It's remarkable how agile Congress is about getting around this fact, but they have made ours an undemocratic system where taxpayer sentiment is ignored.

You could object that some problems require social spending, and I'd agree. And I'm not saying that those who have shouldn't be privately generous toward those who don't. But our public policy is to wait until a problem is enormously expensive and then to send the bill to taxpayers. Alcoholism, illiteracy, homelessness, and abandoned families require expensive answers.

You can't cure such problems with money. They can only be minimized by encouraging respect and strong relationships in the home. There will always be widows and orphans, for instance, but most of the homeless have living relatives. Whatever happened to family loyalty and families who "do for each other"? For that matter, what happened to parents who instilled values in their kids so they didn't get pregnant or stoned or drunk or fail to study in school? And what happened to fathers willing to support their families?

I'll tell you what happened. First we tolerated a selfish ethic that said families weren't important. Rebellion was tolerated among children; adults who put family first were considered second-class professionals. Then when the inevitable happened, government workers went to our afflicted citizens, whom they didn't know very well, and said something like this:

"We won't tell your families, who might actually give us sound advice about your situations. Instead we're going to lump you in with all these other people we don't know well. We're going to throw money at the problem and hope that what we want to give you is what your particular situation requires."

The resulting chaos is so expensive that many in government are seriously considering ways to take almost all inheritance money in taxes. How's that for an attack on family values?

Think about it: did private wealth impoverish other citizens or did it finance the development of so much technology that we're exporting it for free, and even poor Americans seem wealthy by foreign standards? Did private wealth get buried under a mattress or did it provide seed money for new businesses, new jobs and new inventions? Did private wealth take away basic freedoms or did it buy the luxury of having our entire nation study what those basic freedoms are?

The answers are obvious, and they raise more questions. Why do we tolerate covetous politicians who want to tax to death the goose that laid the golden eggs? Can any amount of taxation pay for the consequences of our anti-family ethic?

Gay-bashing joke offensive

One night I was trying to study for an exam in the back of the Hatch. (Don't laugh, I get a lot of studying done there.) Anyway, all around me the Hatch staff busily set up audio equipment with the usual "testing 1,2,3. . ." One of the more so-called "witty" bartenders was up on the stage speaking. With the encouragement of a drunken group in the corner, he told a joke that had to do with "some faggy guy" in a bar. He used that term several times and the crowd really got into it. The joke painted a picture of a gay man who was efemminite and unassertive. The bartender in the joke told him to "go sit in the back of the room. We don't want your kind here." A rough, tough, macho guy comes into the bar saying that "he's so thirsty, he could lick (a section of a bull's anatomy)," to which the gay man replies, "moo-moo."

I was very offended by the joke for several reasons. First, no matter what that bartender feels about gay people, he was a university employee at that moment. The university is committed to fighting that kind of behavior, am I correct? Also, it being "Coming Out Day" nationwide as well as AIDS awareness week (although this is not just a gay issue), he especially should have realized how innaproriate that kind of "humor" is. Lastly, I'm disgusted at how few people made a move to tell this guy what a jerk he was. I complained to the manager, but people should be fired for acts like that! You certaintly don't need to be gay to not want to hear that kind of hate talk in a public place.

Exploring best and worst of local entertainment

By COSMO MACERO JR.
Collegian Staff

Just because it's local, does that mean it's good? Certainly not. There's plenty of shows in the area that should be avoided, even if you're desperate for a fix of live music.

Local Vocal

For instance, Katina's in Hadley, the only real outlet for hard-rock musicians in the Valley, continually comes up short with its Sunday night heavy metal shows. While the Maniax are pretty solid, and have a decent local following, a great many of the other bands just don't deliver the goods. Moussed-out hair, spandex outfits, agonizing drum solos, and forgettable tunes are standard for these cliched metallic fellows. Sure, nothing beats a hot guitarist, but he might as well stand on stage alone if he's going to surround himself with a tribute to Quiet Riot.

This past weekend saw active gigging by both Vital Organ, and the Fantastic Four. Both bands, led by Dave Shuback and Damon Reeves respectively, maintain their status as popular party attractions. Check 'em out.

Tomorrow night, Regency returns to the Hatch stage. Their curious blend of funk, soul, Motown, rock, and Top 40 sounds make for an interesting show.

Iron Elf, and Lather, Rinse, Repeat play the Hatch Thursday and Friday night.

Speaking of Katina's (don't get me wrong, it's my favorite rock club in the area), look for Split Decision to play there in the near future. Stay tuned for specific dates.

As if the Godfathers and Living Colour (Vernon Reid simply hauls ass on guitar!) weren't enough, UPC will give us the Smithereens on Oct. 25. Didn't they open up for (gulp) Southside Johnny a couple of years ago at the Southwest Concert? Don't worry, they're the deserving headliners at this Fine Arts Center show, and they'll prove that New Jersey can still produce legitimate bands, despite the existence of Southside J. and (gasp) Jon Bon Jovi.

The Southwest Battle of the Bands is this Sunday, Oct. 23 in the Hampden Southside Room. It should be a great day of live, local music.

Know of a local band that deserves some ink? Send information to Local Vocal. Give some bands the press they deserve.

Easter redeemed Let's Active; nothing saved The Church

Let's Active/Tom Verlaine/The Church at the Paramount Theater in Springfield
Saturday night

Although I've never been here before, the Paramount Theater in Springfield seems strangely familiar to me. It's almost like I'm back in Glasgow at the Pavilion, where almost exactly a year ago I saw Lloyd Cole make his triumphant home town return. But as I take my seat, it's the lone black-clad Tom Verlaine who occupies the stage. He looks gaunt, ghostly white as he sleep-walks through a mercifully short set of dark-edged folk songs which, in the context of a Saturday night and all of the frenzied partying and general mayhem this implies, come across like funeral dirges.

So it's almost a relief when Let's Active come on, I say "almost" because something is definitely wrong here. Only the effervesc-

Quindlen's "Living" brings focus to the trivial

By SARA GALER

Living Out Loud
By Anna Quindlen
Random House

Is junk food the bane of your existence? Do you think Halloween has lost its connotations of youthful irreverence? Are you a closet reader of the National Enquirer?

Yes? No? Even if these questions leave you with a definite maybe, youll be interested in checking out "Living Out Loud," a new book by New York Times columnist Anna Quindlen. The book is a compilation of Quindlen's Life in the 30's column which have appeared regularly in the New York Times since 1986.

Quindlen begins the book with a poignant essay about the death of her mother. Here the author demonstrates her remarkable ability for summing up her feelings without getting too sentimental. Her truthful insights get sharper as Quindlen goes on discussing some often neglected aspects of marriage, motherhood, maturity and love.

"I remember being in love like this. Entering in to a state more like a tropical disease than a relationship . . ." she writes in the piece simply titled "Married." Here Quindlen explores the difference between infatuation and dedication with the wit she quickly establishes as her trademark. Although her topics may sound trivial at first, she always manages to bestow them with validity. Quindlen concludes this essay by describing her husband simultaneously as the beneficiary on her insurance policy and the love of her life.

In fact, transforming the frivolous into matters of heartfelt importance is the essence of Quindlen's talent. Much of her practical humor is derived from this source. Lightning bugs, flannel nightgowns, air conditioners are all fair game for this author. Quindlen writes that she felt a sense of continuity when her husband expressed dislike for a certain nightgown: "one of those little numbers that looks like a fallout shelter and is designed to reveal only that the body beneath possesses ankles."

The point lies in "the magic little thrill you always get you realize that some things in life are immutable."

Quindlen often has words where most people only have unexpressed feelings. She writes in the essay "Putting Up A Good Front" that "all of these things may seem like superficialities but of course we all know that the purse is the mirror of the soul, and that people whose closets are filled with old tennis racket cases although they have never played tennis are hiding something in their psyches too."

Quindlen's humor successfully creates import where none was thought possible, and her message lies therein. We should take time to consider the trivial, because it plays a larger role in our lives than we think. Quindlen takes that time, and the results are satisfying.

cent Mitch Easter looks like he's having anything even remotely approaching "a good time." Admittedly good pop songs like "Sweepstakes Winner" and "Horizon," which on vinyl comes across like a rush of air, are stomped on by leaden drums and an excess of "power" guitar work, for which Easter himself must take most of the blame. It's the same old story; like most bands, Let's Active seem to think that playing live gives them license to physically abuse their creations.

Their new album is titled Every Dog Has His Day, which is ironic considering that Let's Active are tonight supporting Australian third-rater pseudo-goths The Church, who are as bad as their title suggests. Their vacuous, empty-headed songs waft over me and evaporate like so much dry ice. You'd think, if only by the law of averages, that there'd be at least one decent tune in their two hour set. But The Church and all the rest of their goth ilk, with the exception of The Wonderstuff have no understanding of the basic principles of good pop music; their songs are about as danceable as freshly laid tar. They have names like "Unsubstantiated," "Tristesse" and "Spark." Enigmatic, huh? No, just vague, meaningless, reflecting the vast empty windswept plains that must exist between the band's collective ears.

If I'd wanted to hear people mucking around with effects pedals, I'd have gone to see Lee Renaldo; at least he has some idea what he's doing and why. The Church have no idea, period.

Reading Roger Rabbit isn't as good as seeing him

Who Censored Roger Rabbit?
By Gary Wolf Ballentine Books

Who Framed Roger Rabbit? has become this year's biggest hit, and like many hit films, its success has seen a book version released. Unlike most movie books, though, Gary Wolf's Who Censored Roger Rabbit? is not an adaptation, but the original novel on which the film was based.

Unfortunately, those looking to relive Roger's silliness are sure to be disappointed; as the saying goes, the film is never like the book.

There are many differences between Wolf's 'toon world and Zemeckis'. For one thing, Roger is a comic strip star here, and he talks not with a voice, but with word balloons which form in the air. And unlike the screen characters, the toons here can most definitely be hurt by conventional firearms. But when a 'toon needs a stunt double, it can create a doppelganger, or double, which can perform almost any task until the toon wills it to disperse.

These characteristics all play a part in the book's mystery element, which is emphasized far more here than in the film. In fact, aside from the presence of the 'toons, Censored is written like a generic version of the familiar private eye story. Eddie Valiant even narrates the book, tossing out streetwise similes at every opportunity. Even to a person like me, who rarely reads a mystery, this is familiar stuff.

Perhaps this is why I found the book to be a disappointment. Wolf's treatment of this cartoon/private eye world is so standard that he robs his amusing idea of almost all of its charm. His 'toons are more or less indistinguishable from the humans in their behavior, and whatever differences they have seem to have been invented for the sake of Wolf's mystery. At times, I had trouble remembering whether certain characters were 'toon or human.

This brings me to Wolf's greatest failing in this book. He simply cannot describe his cartoon characters. With his pseudo-Sam Spade dialogue, the best he can do to describe Roger is to say that he looked like he "had just walked face first into a freshly painted wall." The reader is simply expected to believe that the character is a cartoon.

Still, the book has its points. Wolf's serious depictions of a 'toon society in a real world formed the obvious basis for the film, which made improvements on nearly all of his ideas. Wolf's mystery is definitely superior to the film's. The ending, though far more downbeat than anything in the film, is definitely moving.

Censored can be enjoyed by someone interested in the development of the film, or by mystery and fantasy fans who don't mind seeing their genres crossed. Those hoping to see the movie Roger in print, however, are advised to look for the photo storybook.

PENTAGON PROTEST — Demonstrators carrying crosses march on the Pentagon grounds to protest United States' Central American policy yesterday.

Bush ads do the trick in Calif.

LOS ANGELES (AP) — In just 60 seconds, George Bush transformed his prospects in California from a potential landslide loss to Democrat Michael Dukakis into a dead-heat battle for the state's 47 electoral votes, the biggest prize in the presidential election.

That magic minute for Bush was comprised of two 30-second television commercials, one attacking Dukakis for pollution in Boston Harbor, the other focusing on the Massachusetts program permitting furloughs for prison inmates.

Before those commercials began airing on TV stations throughout the state, Dukakis held a strong, often double-digit, lead over Bush among California voters in public opinion polls.

The Massachusetts governor had been scoring heavily with strong attacks on the Reagan-Bush administration's environmental record and with speeches linking the vice president to Gen. Manuel Antonio Noriega, whom Dukakis described as a "drug-running Panamanian dictator."

But since the Bush campaign began its Boston Harbor and crime commercials, the gap between the two candidates has narrowed in the nations's largest state.

Dukakis has counterattacked with a commercial contending that "it was Bush's administration of cutting money allocated to clean up the California coast as well.

So when you hear George Bush talk about the environment, remember what he did to the environment," the commercial concludes. Dukakis has the support of major environmental organizations in California.

The lure of this state's 47 electoral votes - nearly one-sixth of the 270 needed for election on Nov. 8 - has brought the state a steady stream of campaign visits and an avalanche of money.

"California is an integral part of nearly every winning scenario," said Dukakis campaign communications director Leslie Dach.

Dukakis has spent 10 days in California since Labor Day and will be in the state at least six more days before Election Day.

Courthouse renovations begin

BOSTON (AP) — The state has begun a $320 million effort to renovate and replace 11 Massachusetts courthouses, but it will take some time before the changes are noticeable to the public, court officials said.

"It's a new process for all of us," said Stephen J. Carroll, superintendent of the Suffolk County Courthouse, who is now in charge of daily operations at the 11 buildings. "It has taken decades for the buildings to get where they are, and it's going to take some time to bring them back."

Under a law signed by Gov. Michael Dukakis on July 26, the state is taking ownership of the 11 most dilapidated of the state's 100 city-and-county owned courthouses.

The legislature has authorized the state to spend up to $20 million in emergency repairs and $300 million to rehabilitate the buildings and construct or purchase new ones. But the Boston Globe reported Monday that priorities for the work are only beginning to be set.

'We believe expectations have been raised to a high level by this," said Henry L. Barr, administrator of the state trial courts, "and we are not confident we can meet them."

Under the courthouse improvement act, the state became responsible for the Lawrence Superior Courthouse and all 10 courthouses in Suffolk County on Oct 1.

In addition, the measure gives county and municipalities until Jan. 1, 1990, to decide whether to transfer ownership of other courthouses to the state.

Bullet casing tied to murder

LOWELL (AP) — A State Police ballistics expert testified yesterday that a bullet casing found in Daniel J. LaPlante's basement matched casings from the bullets used in the slaying of the young Townsend mother LaPlante is accused of killing.

State Trooper Philip Langton said that a gun found in a car behind LaPlante's home fired the shells that killed Priscilla Gustafson, 33, and a casing found in LaPlante's basement.

Two casings were found in a pillow case outside the Gustafson home shortly after the shooting. The casings were also matched with a shell taken from the home where LaPlante is accused of stealing the gun in October.

"My opinion is all four of these cartridges cases were fired from this specific weapon, and no other weapon," Langton said.

LaPlante is on trial for shooting Gustafson and then drowning her two children, William, 5, and Abigail, 7, last Dec. 1.

And speaking of first starts, junior goalkeeper Mary Curtis will get the call for the first time in her collegiate career for UMass. Rudy feels that Curtis, who has seen only late-game action in her career, needs to get some game experience against a big opponent in case something were to ever happen to regular goalie Carla DeSantis.

"If anything ever happened to Carla, we'd have to send Mary in their cold," Rudy said.

Sidelines: Despite the magnitude of this weekend's games, the home crowds were estimated at only around 150 each day. But, at least 40 each day were loyal traveling UMass parents and fans. . . North Carolina State had allowed only two goals in 15 games before yielding three to the Minutewomen on Sunday. . . When legends meet: While the Minutewomen were waiting in Raleigh-Durham Airport on Friday night, who should walk by but N.C. State hoop coach Jim Valvano. The loquacious and friendly Valvano was bringing in a recruit from Texas and spent a couple minutes chatting with UM assistant Lisa Gozley and the players.

The only blemish in the UM season has been an upset loss to George Washington University (the Penn State loss could hardly be called an upset).

"The GW match could come back to haunt us," Ford said.

For now, UMass appears to be one of the top three teams in the conference. With the Atlantic 10 tournament only four weeks away, UMass realizes every game has become very important. The Minutewomen will be jockying for position with the University of Rhode Island, GWU, and West Virginia in the final stretch.

That's why the Minutewomen have been working on some new offensive plays, according to Ford. The "tandem" is the latest addition to the arsenal.

In the tandem, the hitter closest to the net fakes the hit, but the back row hitter is the one that actually receives the ball, which will hopefully be hit against the defense's falling block.

■ field hockey

Kennedy, whose totals include eleven goals and one assist. Junior Kathy DeAngelis is also in double figures in points for UMass with seven goals and three assists.

Sophomore Elise McDevitt and junior Mara Frattasio have provided spark off the bench in Hixon's "platooning" system. McDevitt has scored five goals and Frattasio has scored five goals and two assists.

The Big Green has been hot as of late. Dartmouth has won six of its last seven games and its last four in a row. But Hixon knows what the Minutewomen will have to do to counter.

"We need to play ball control," Hixon said "We need to get it down in their end and keep it there and not let them work the ball out very much. Because I think the more pressure we apply, the certainly the better our chances are."

Men's x-country 4th at Easterns

By JOHN STEVEN MARPLE
Collegian Correspondent

Once in a while a coach bites the bullet and goes with youth and inexperience over the more seasoned and battle-tested player.

Sometimes the results are less than favorable. Other times the outcome is beneficial.

University of Massachusetts men's cross country coach Ken O'Brien chose to sit out his top six runners Saturday at the Easterns. And while UMass did not win the meet (Keene State did with 60 points), O'Brien was still pleased with the fourth-place finish turned in by the Minutemen.

"The kids ran well," O'Brien said. "This was a race for our kids with little varsity experience. They did a good job."

Lowell took second place behind Keene State with 61 points, followed by Southern Connecticut (92 points), UMass (111) and the University of New Hampshire (124).

UMass will travel to New York City for the Atlantic 10 Conference Championship Saturday.

Before the Easterns, O'Brien felt that Keene State, Lowell and Southern Connecticut were the best three in the meet. The tops three teams are all excellent," he said. It would have been the icing on the cake for us to crack the No. 3 spot."

Keene State's Scott Hatch ("a very good runner," according to O'Brien) won the race with a finishing time of 24:55. UMass junior Fitz Hagan was the top Minuteman finisher in 11th place with a time of 25:23.

"It was the best race of the year," O'Brien said. "He showed the kind of aggressiveness reserved needed for a championship meet."

Sophomore John Corso was next for UMass at 26:16 (19th place), followed by junior Joe Livorsi (26:18, 20th place) and senior John Lorenzini (26:46, 32nd place).

"I was very pleased," O'Brien said. "This was a race where we got some inexperienced kids into varsity competition. It should help them."

Club Sports Roundup

The University of Massachusetts Rugby Club improved its record to 4-1 Saturday by beating the University of Vermont three games to none.

All three of UMass' sides preformed excellently, dominating UVM while posting wins of 26-3, 16-0, and 30-0, for one of their easier victories of the season.

UMass is now gearing up for the New England Tournament to be held in Worcester October 28.

Anyone interested in playing rugby should report to the practice field in front of the Water Treatment Center in Lower Boyden Field. Practice is held Tuesday-Thursday from 4-6 p.m. No experience is needed.

Editor's note: The Collegian this semester is featuring the Club Sports Roundup as a service to those club sports or teams on campus who are otherwise unable to be covered.

The Collegian welcomes submissions from any and all teams wishing to be included in this feature. All submissions are to be addressed to the Club Sports Writer. Submissions may be dropped off at the Collegian or sent through campus mail, but they must be received by Monday at 2 p.m. in order to be printed.

The feature will be run subject to space limitations, so there is no guarantee submissions will make the paper.

Sports Notices

The University of Massachusetts men's basketball team will hold an open tryout for those interested in playing for the Minutemen.

It will be tonight at 8:30 p.m. in the Curry Hicks Cage.

The team has also announced it will hold an open practice for the faculty Thursday at 3:30 p.m. in the Cage.

All interested faculty members are encouraged to attend the practice.

The intramural office has announced that volleyball entries are still being accepted.

Also, the annual swim meet is scheduled for Nov. 2 at 7 p.m. at the Boyden Pool.

Michelle Powers (10) and the women's soccer team will play host to Harvard University this afternoon. UMass had one day off after two games in North Carolina over the weekend.

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team won't have had much time rest after this weekend's trip to North Carolina before playing Harvard University this afternoon at Boyden Field (3 p.m.).

Then again, maybe that's a good thing.

The Minutewomen have come home sky high after an emotionally-charged 3-2 victory over North Carolina State, the nation's second-ranked team this past week. This coming on the heels of a 4-0 loss to North Carolina, the top team in the country, on Saturday.

UMass had to battle from start to finish against the Wolfpack. Having already lost a tough game, the Minutewomen were insistent that they wouldn't come back to Amherst with two losses.

Bursting out to a 2-0 lead, the Minutewomen looked in good shape. But the Wolfpack showed why they are ranked where they are, rallying to tie the game at 2-2 late.

"I think everyone in the stadium thought we were done," UMass coach Jim Rudy said.

But not quite. April Kater's goal with five minutes left gave the Minutewomen their biggest win of the season. They will be looking to carry that momentum into today's game. Matched up with the fact that the visiting Crimson are only 3-6, including five consecutive losses, the odds are looking good for UMass.

Yet, Rudy still feels this is a crucial game.

"They [Harvard] are in our region, so we have to win this one," Rudy said. "They have a lot of Massachusetts girls on their team (six) who would like to show up the state school."

The visiting Crimson, coached by Tim Wheaton, haven't exactly been lighting it up this year. Of their five consecutive losses, four have been shutouts, including a heartbreaking 1-0 loss to Dartmouth on Saturday in which they gave up the deciding goal with three minutes left in the game.

They don't have a lot of attack up front," Rudy said.

The team's leading scorer, senior captain Amy Winston, has just seven points (a goal and five assists), while only three players have more than one goal (each have just two).

One of those players could be the key to Harvard's hopes today, that being sophomore midfielder Tracy Hackeling.

"She [Hackeling] is good in the air and is probably their key player in setting the tone of their game," Rudy said.

The starting goalkeeper is expected to be sophomore Beth Reilly, who got her first-ever start in the Dartmouth game. Reilly has allowed one goal over 162 minutes while making 23 saves.

Field hockey to battle the Big Green

By GEORGE AUSTIN
Collegian Staff

Today's field hockey game between Dartmouth College and the University of Massachusetts at 3 p.m. in Hanover, NH will be a battle of division leaders.

UMass is leading the East Division of the Atlantic 10 with a 3-0 record. It is also ranked No. 3 in the country by the NCAA and No. 1 in New England, and 12-1-1 overall.

The Big Green are tied for first place in the Ivy League with the University of Pennsylvania. Both have 3-1 records. Dartmouth is 6-4 overall and though they are not ranked in the top five in New England, the Big Green could give the Minutewomen a run for their money.

"They're always tough at home," UMass coach Pam Hixon said. "They play a little different style then we are used to. They use a lot of deflections. They continue to run at you over and over again."

The biggest question for the Minutewomen coming into this game will be at the center back position where sophomore starter Kerri Fagan is out with a sprained back suffered in practice right before the 8-0 win over Fairfield University.

Hixon is wrestling with a couple of possibilities. One could be to start sophomore Lisa Berardinelli, who has started the last two games for UMass and has done the job pretty well. The Minutewomen gave up only one goal in those two games though they played two struggling teams in Fairfield and the University of New Hampshire.

Another option is to move senior co-captain Pam Bustin from her midfield position to the center back spot.

"That is going to be a important decision for us," Hixon said. "We are going to be just as strong with her (Bustin) at centerback as we are with her in the midfield. That's really what we're toying with right now."

The defense's main target today will be sophomore left wing Laurie Khelokian who has scored eight goals and two assists.

"She is very strong, really fiesty, clean but physical, throws her body around a lot so she's unsettling," Hixon said. "We really need to keep the ball away from her."

One other forward that UMass will have to keep its eyes on is sophomore Ann Rosamond who has scored four goals and dished out two assists.

The defense for Dartmouth is anchored by junior goaltender Karen Hartwig. Hartwig has made 60 saves in playing in all but 20 minutes of the Big Green's games. She has recorded four shutouts and carries a 1.50 goals against average.

If the UMass attack plays up to the level that it has played all year, then Hartwig should be in for a very busy afternoon.

The Minutewomen attack has been led by senior Tonia

Volleyball travels to Central Conn.

By RONN GARRY
Collegian Staff

No kidding around, the University of Massachusetts volleyball team has had tougher matches than tonight's opponent, Central Connecticut State University.

The Minutewomen are coming off their hardest fought victories of the season this weekend and will face a team that they beat three straight games earlier in the season (only allowing 17 points all match). A loss however, would severely damage UMass' post-season rank, so the Minutewomen cannot afford to underestimate or belittle the Blue Devils.

"I don't want to take them lightly," UMass coach Carol Ford said. "We want to use this as an opportunity to maintain what we did this weekend," when UMass downed two of its toughest Atlantic 10 opponents, West Virginia and Duquesne Universities, on successive nights.

"There's going to be such a big difference between what we saw this weekend," and tonight's match, Ford said.

Central is currently 7-20 but it is coming off and equally successful weekend in which they won the Fairfield University Tournament. The Blue Devils won three straight matches against St. Peters, Fairfield, and Siena Universities. A win tonight, in addition to avenging the earlier loss to UMass, would probably be the biggest victory of the CCSU season.

The Blue Devils aren't facing the same UMass squad they faced in September however, and that could be a scary, Gen. Custer-ish display.

"We've come a long way since we played Central," Ford said. In fact, "we've come a long way since we played Penn State," two weeks ago.

"We've improved both mentally and technically, especially mentally. [The players] have committed themselves to having a good season," Ford said.

Thus far it has been a good season. The Minutewomen are 13-2, and 3-2 in the conference. They've beaten last year's second place A-10 team, two of the top Ivy league teams, and are undefeated at home with a 7-0 record.

Students pay for breaking booze policy

By RICK SASSON
Collegian Staff

Two University of Massachusetts students who violated Amherst's open-container bylaw last weekend are helping to finance future police crackdowns.

But they are not doing it out of the kindness of their hearts.

"It's not common to assess the costs of police overtime as restitution — that's unusual."
— Attorney Meade Burrows

Hampshire District Court Judge Alvertus Morse, in a decision one local attorney calls "unusual," ordered the two students on Monday to pay the town $100 each in restitution for their violations.

The money will help pay police overtime costs, which have averaged $5,000 each weekend the department has cracked down.

In his decision, Morse reasoned if 50 students are arrested on a given weekend, fining each student $100 will cover the $5,000 assessed by the police department to patrol in full force on weekends.

"The main purpose of this is to slow things down," Morse said in a telephone interview last night. "Activity downtown has gone too far."

The case was continued without a finding, meaning that provided the students stay out of trouble for six months, their records will be clean. The fine for a guilty verdict is $50, not including court costs.

Northampton attorney Meade Borrows, who has handled student cases involving alcohol, said ordering restitution for an open-container violation is an innovation he has not seen in Amherst.

"It's not common to assess the costs of police overtime as restitution — that's unusual. Overtime is considered to be the usual cost of the town," Burrows said. "The question is who is the victim? It is not clear to me that the police are the victim."

Selectman Chairwoman Edith Wilkinson said a case could be made that the town has fallen victim to students at UMass.

"What's happening is the town is the victim — everybody has to pay for this [the overtime] with proposition 2 1/2," Wilkinson said.

Thomas Whitney, an Amherst attorney who has represented UMass students in similar cases, said the order of restitution could work as an incentive for police to make more arrests.

"The only danger with restitution is that it could encourage enforcement not for the sake of enforcement but for the sake of fundraising," he said.

Morse said last night that other judges may not follow his lead.

"What's happening is that the town is the victim — everybody has to pay for this."
Chairwoman Edith Wilkinson

"It's not the wave of the future necessarily," he said. "This seemed at the time to be the appropriate thing to do."

Amherst Police Chief Donald Maia announced last week that his department would patrol in full force, all 30 officers, each weekend until noise complaints and alcohol-related incidents drop in number.

Amherst police have submitted an article on the Nov. 9 special town meeting, requesting $50,000 for overtime costs through June 30, 1989.

Speech on Africa given

By THOMAS MAMBANDE
Collegian Staff

Three important African statesmen appeared in the Five College area Monday and spoke about the problems facing Southern Africa and what role Americans can play in solving them.

Valeriano Farao, Mozambican Ambassador to the United States, Randall Robinson, the director of TransAfrica, and Prexy Nesbitt of the Mozambique Support Network, visited Amherst and Hampshire Colleges and the University of Massachusetts in observance of World Food Day and expanded the topic to Southern Africa's most imminent problems.

At a reception for Farao held in the Alumnae Room of Amherst College, the ambassador stressed the importance of combating apartheid and attacking "at the source [of the] evils" plaguing the region.

Robinson said understanding of the region's problems is essential in combating them.

"Most Americans and especially the conservative elements in this country arguing against aid to Mozambique do not understand the mechanics of South Africa and the rest of the region. There is a fundamental kind of ignorance...they know very little about Mozambique, Renamo and that sort of thing," Robinson said.

Renamo are the insurgent guerillas operating inside Mozambique to destabilize the country. Numbering approximately 10,000, Renamo has been linked to the apartheid regime in South Africa.

All three of the men said South Africa, in efforts to protect the longevity of the internationally illegal system of enforced racial subjugation and brutalization, has given large amounts of financial assistance and training to Renamo as an insurance against a strong neighbor hostile to apartheid, said Robinson.

According to reports compiled by UNICEF, last year alone Renamo was responsible for the deaths of 10,000 children, as well as equally staggering numbers of men and women who, if not killed outright, are maimed or crippled.

Ambassador Farao blasted the US government for what he called its acquiescence to the atrocities of Renamo.

"If Libya opened an office or an embassy in Washington there would be an outcry. Yet Renamo has done just that — they have an office in Washington and nothing is said or thought of it."

Prexy Nesmith of the Chicago-based Mozambique Network alluded to a report published recently by the State Department to convey more clearly the nature of Renamo.

The report described Renamo as "at best a group that steals and pillages rampantly within Mozambique, at worst, a group carrying out the systematic, brutal destruction of a people comparable only to the Nazi Holocaust."

Farao, Robinson and Nesmith were all in agreement with how much of an impact American citizens, especially college students, can have in deciding what course the US takes in determining the future of Mozambique.

They called for active participation on the part of citizens and students in putting pressure on Congress people and other elected officials who presently run the country based upon the interests of the influential few as opposed to the apathetic many.

"Governments do nothing because of morality or ethics. Governments act to further their own interests based upon conditions that prevail at that time," Nesmith said. He said that US leniency towards South Africa is what keeps the apartheid regime in power, and in turn, keeps the power of apartheid flexed in the neighboring region. He also said the conservative and ultra conservative elements within the country like Senator Jesse Helms, Senator Dan Burton, Jimmy Swaggart, and groups like the Young Republicans, the Heritage Foundation and other groups with similar ideologies oppose and attempt to thwart progressive policy measures towards Southern Africa.

Nesmith also stressed the importance of the presidency.

KISS FOR GOOD LUCK — Gov. Michael Dukakis gets a good luck kiss from Jessica Ontiveros, 5, of Saginaw, Mich. after a rally yesterday at Arthur Hill High School.

Dukakis sends out more help to keep campaign chances alive

BOSTON (AP) — Michael Dukakis is trying to bolster his organization in vital states by sending dozens of aides from his national headquarters into the field and backing them up with more that 1,300 new volunteers from Washington, aides said yesterday.

Jack Conragan, director of operations for the Democratic campaign, said about 60 percent of the workers at the Boston Headquarters are being assigned to target states for the final three weeks of the campaign. He could not provide a specific number.

Among the senior Dukakis aides assisting with the drive Marcia Hale, who since the Democratic National Convention in July has been working on plans for a transition to a Dukakis presidency.

Hale, a South Carolina native, has temporarily delegated her tranisition duties to a deputy and now is focusing, from Boston, on southern states in which the Democrats believe they are still competitive, principally Georgia and Louisiana.

Joining the Boston oeratives being assigned to field operatives will be more than 1,300 new volunteers from Washington, said Wendy Sherman, who runs Dukakis' headquarters there. That group consists of congressional aides who have taken leaves, numerous attorneys with ties to Democratic politics and college students form area campuses, Sherman said.

"It's a pretty encouraging sign, I think, about how strong we are going to be in the field Election Day," Corrigan said. "We have a very strong grass-roots organization. It got us through the primaries and it is one of the things that is going to pull us through on Election Day."

Volunteers, depending on their prior election experience, will be assigned tasks ranging from political work in target precincts to helping with phone calls and distribution leaflets, Ms. Sherman said.

Some of the congressional aides, most of whom have worked on prior campaigns, are being sent back to their home states but many also are being assigned to key states, she said.

"Our state party offices are quite capable of running a very effective get-out-the-vote effort but you need bodies to do that," she said Tuesday in a telephone interview. "This will give us the influx of people we need to win on election night."

The congressional recess also will allow the Dukakis campaign to schedule more appearances by members of Congress who have volunteered to serve as surrogates for the Democratic ticket, Corrigan said.

Recent polls have shown Dukakis well behind Bush, but Ms. Sherman said party officials calling her office to request more volunteers have been relaying a far more optimistic picture.

NRC says sorry to expelled man

BOSTON (AP) — The Nuclear Regulatory Commission has issued an apology to a state safety official who was dragged from a commission meeting Friday when he tried to speak out against restarting the Pilgrim nuclear power station.

Peter Agnes, an assistant secretary of the Executive Office of Public Safety, was removed from a Maryland hearing room by security guards when he rose to tell the panel that the five towns within 10 miles of Pilgrim are not prepared for an emergency at the plant.

Lando w. Zech, chairman of the NRC, apologized to Agnes in a letter received Monday and offered Agnes a meeting with the NRC staff to air his concerns, The Patriot Ledger reported yesterday.

The 7-5 vote came at 8:30, just after nearly 70 black and Jewish students packed room 811 in the Campus Center to debate Farrakhan's views and watch of a video of one of his speeches.

Anthony Gee, a member of both the fraternity and DVP, led the effort to bring the minister. He said the American media has led the public astray on Farrakhan, who has been labled by Jewish leaders as an extremist who is anti-Israel.

"The media has taken his meaning out of context," Gee told the Collegian after the vote was taken. He said Farrakhan has preached simply that a person can not love someone unless he learns to love him or herself first.

As to the date of the visit, Gee said, "We're shooting for early Febuary. We feel it's appropriate to have it during black history month."

"We feel it's time to have leaders that express our pride and dignity — not leaders that are hand-picked," Gee said.

Members of Hillel, the Progressive Zionist Caucus, and other concerned Jewish students came to voice thier concern over using student monies to sponsor the event. Discussions about Farrakhan were spirited at times, but according to Gee and members of the Jewish community, there was no element of hostility at last night's meeting.

Scott Kramer, a concerned Jewish student who is a member of the UMass Republican club, said bringing Farrakhan is an insult to an entire community.

"Farrakhan is a rabid anti-semite — he's called Judaism a gutter religion. He is the extreme fringe of the black sepratist movement. Student funds shouldn't be used to pay an honoranium to such a rabid hatemonger."

UMass ombuds office handles grievances

By JOHN SWANSON
Collegian Staff

At a school as large as the University of Massachusetts, invariably someone is going to feel they have been mistreated. Enter Howard Gadlin.

As Ombudsperson, Gadlin's job is to ensure that every person affiliated with the University is treated fairly.

"The office is a place where anybody on campus — faculty, staff or student — can come for assistance in working out a grievance or solving a problem. What goes on in this office is confidential. So, if somebody comes here and they want to talk over a situation that's difficult for them, but are unsure about whether or not they want to act on it, or want us to act on it, that's okay. We'll talk over the situation and look at the range of options that are available to them," he said.

Gadlin said he prefers people contact the Ombuds Office only "after they've tried to go through normal channels," but persons who do not trust these channels could discuss the situation with him beforehand.

More than half of the cases Gadlin deals with are "student-initiated." However, "probably more than half our time (is spent) on non-student cases because some of the employee cases get so much more complicated. They're really long and drawn out," he said.

The Ombuds office was created at UMass in 1971. Gadlin, who is the sixth person to hold the office, was hired in 1982.

Gadlin said he does not use litigation to settle disputes. The ombudsman does not have to be a lawyer to hold the position.

"We work informally. We work by trying to elicit the cooperation of all parties and to help structure solutions to problems that leave everyone with some degree of satisfaction," he said. Gadlin added if one side "wins," he tries to find a solution that will not humiliate the other party.

He said grade disputes are a common student grievance, but students should not come to him if they simply want a higher grade.

"If you feel you've been treated in a sort of arbitrary and capricious way . . . if your grade wasn't calculated according to the prescribed way that the instructor said it would be, then you might come here," he said.

If Gadlin is unable to help the disputing parties come to an agreement, then he arranges for a hearing with a board composed of faculty and students who hear the case and make recommendations.

Gadlin said the Undergraduate Grade Grievance Procedure, the Graduate Grievance Procedure and the Academic Honesty Policy all function through his office.

"We also get employee and faculty problems here. If someone feels that their supervisor hasn't treated them fairly or that their job schedule has been shifted improperly . . . or any number of issues that could be an employee problem, they can come here," he said.

Feminist urges women toward powerful posts

By MARIA SACCHETTI
and JANINE WARNER
Collegian Staff

It is time for women to conquer legislative hurdles, start changing the rules and to stop being political observers, said Ellie Smeal, the founder and president of the Fund for the Feminist Majority, in a lecture last night in the Student Union Ballroom.

Despite strong national advocacy for women's rights, recurring political roadblocks and inequal representation prevent women's issues from reaching the forefront of the political spectrum, said Smeal, a former president of the National Organization for Women.

"Our system is not reflecting the attitude of the public and it is not changing with the times," she said.

"We are about to enter the decade of the 1990s and we still don't have an equal rights amendment. Most people think the laws we have are strong enough to mandate equal pay," she said, but women are still earning 64 cents for every male earned dollar.

More than 50 percent of Americans polled are in favor of pay equity, she said, but "to this day, Congress can't pass something even to study it."

"They argue on the basis it would cost money," Smeal said. "[The study] would cost $1 million. We spend more money studying pickles."

Smeal attributes the lack of legislative movement toward equal rights to a sharp imbalance in the number of men and women in decision making positions.

Men fill 95 percent of congressional seats and, at the current rate of growth, it will be the year 2333 before women hold 50 percent of those seats, she said.

"We have to encourage more women to run," she said.

"I think it matters that we are in this position of not being at the tables when the national budget is being decided."

Women who run for public office typically wait until their late 30s and early 40s to launch their campaign while men begin political careers in their mid 20s, Smeal said.

We have to stop waiting until we have more experience, she said. "Women have to start extra early because it takes us a little longer to get there. "So often young women who might want to be a US senator won't say it," she said. But younger women need to be encouraged. "If a woman is to compete, she should know she can win," she said.

Smeal said women should not be afraid to run against each other. "How many times have we said if you put two women up it will divide the ticket? Does anyone ever say that about men?

"If all the women who are running [for congress] right now were to win, it would barely change the percentages," she said. We have to encourage more women to run."

"Women need to flood the ticket. We've got to get it into our brain that when a woman is defeated, we put up ten more the next time," she said.

The lack of women in American politics is very different from representation in other areas of the world, Smeal said. The United States has fewer female members of congress or national parliament than any country in Europe except Greece, she said.

"We like to think of the United States as a leader," she said. "But in the representation of women in power, we're lagging behind."

"I am sick of protesting. It would be a whole lot easier if we were pushing the buttons ourselves," Smeal said. "We have to start talking more about what we see the dream to be and going for it. The worst thing they've done to us is make us stop dreaming," she said.

Controversy over Jupiter C5A heats up

Selectmen delay whether to write Westover a letter

LISA JOHNSON
Collegian Correspondent

CHICOPEE — About 20 miles South of Amherst, at the Westover Air Force Base, pilots are trained to fly one of the largest cargo planes in existence, the Jupiter C5A.

The training flights simulate landings and take-offs sometimes as often as 20 times a session. The Air Force currently has 10 of these planes and will increase the number to 16 by February, said an Air Force spokesperson.

To some people the C5's are a sin, they claim noise and air pollution are threatening the quality of life in this area. To others they are a blessing, a chance to renew the economy in the weakest area of the state.

It has become a classic shootout between environmentalists and economists.

David Keith, an active member of the Valley Citizens for a Safe Environment, a group opposing the C5's, approached the Amherst Selectmen Monday night asking their written support in an appeal challenging an Air Force environmental impact statement that claims there are no problems with either noise or air pollution in this region.

"The Air Force said there'd be zero impact on Amherst, " Keith said. "People have written letters to the (Amherst) Selectmen complaining about the noise so obviously there are some errors in the environmental impact statement because people are annoyed."

"What we're challenging is the statement," said Keith. "The suit doesn't say the Air Force can't put the C5's there, it just tells us what happens when they do."

The case was brought to the Federal District Court and lost.

The Valley group is considering an appeal and is looking for philosophical support from towns, particularly from those within the cargo planes training flight paths, of which Amherst is one.

Selectmen said they would make a decision about the letter November 7 at a regularly scheduled meeting.

This issue is now spilling onto campus. Last week, Keith debated Bradford Parker, an Amherst resident that belongs to a pro-C5A group called Citizens for the C5.

Parker along with his wife, Lane, have collected 177 student signatures to support the C5's. Overall the group say they've collected between 4,000 - 5,000 signatures.

"They fly over our house," said Bradford Parker. "We enjoy them and there's nothing wrong with that."

'Our happiest experience was at the campus center last week, we didn't know what to expect, we had maybe five vehement students against the C5's but most of the reaction was very positive," said Parker.

"The people who are against this aren't really upset with the noise or anything else, they're against the military," Parker said.

Keith on the other said, "I think both Parkers are really nice, well-meaning people who really don't know that much about this."

While the debate over pollution continues, area businesses are hoping the expanding air field will bring new revenues to the region.

"They have a direct payroll of 42.5 million a year," said John Frykenberg, treasurer of Citizens for C5 and a member of the Chicopee Chamber of Commerce. "That money is going into the local economy and all of Western Massachusetts."

"It would be foolish for anyone to get rid of that strip of concrete because what I can only believe to be extremely selfish people are worried about their own personal annoyance or inconvenience," said Frykenberg.

Both groups say they will continue to be active on campus and try to attract student support.

An Air Force spokesman could not be reached for comment.

Kennedy says the Duke is down but not out

By NANCY KLINGENER
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — The Democratic ticket may be down in the polls, but it is not out of the presidential race, U.S. Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said yesterday.

Kennedy, in a brief appearance before about 200 people at a "Democratic town meeting" at the John F. Kennedy Middle School, recalled the 1968 election, when he said Hubert Humphrey gained about a point a day in polls at the very end of the race.

"If that election had been delayed by a couple of days, Hubert Humphrey would have been president of the United States, not Richard Nixon — and what a difference that would have made," he said.

Kennedy, who is a member of the Senate's judiciary committee, said another Republican administration would put important Consitutional rights in jeopardy.

"Think of the quality of justice in our society," he said. "That is in and of itself enough to make sure we are going to be tireless in the next three weeks."

The senior senator from Massachusetts, who is campaigning for re-election this year, said the last eight years had been a "holding action" against a Republican administration without concern for social issues.

Kennedy said he wished Vice President George Bush had accompanied him on visits to some of the 25 toxic waste sites in Massachusetts, which he called "underground Chernobyls."

"Not one of those sites has been cleaned up under the Reagan-Bush administration," he said.

He also criticized the Republicans for presiding over cuts in student aid and increased debt loads, which keep college students from going into teaching, nursing and other low-paying fields.

"We have seen the dollar sign put back into our schools and colleges," he said.

Kennedy only spoke for about 10 minutes before the crowd, and took three questions before leaving for another Northampton appearance.

He said he would probably vote against the safe energy initiative, a referendum question on the state ballot which would shut down the state's nuclear power plants if passed.

Although he is against nuclear power, early closings of the plants would leave taxpayers with a billion dollar shortfall, and "I don't find that right or equitable," Kennedy said.

Security administrator making UMass safer

By HOLLY ANGELO
Collegian Correspondent

From preventing trespassers entering buildings to curbing alcohol abuse on campus, Carol Radzik, assistant director of public safety, is working around the clock to strengthen security at the University of Massachusetts.

Radzik, a UMass graduate and former residential education staff member, manages the daily routine of more than 800 security personnel, including 25 institutional security officers.

She said her advancement to security administrator was "a natural progression."

"College for me was an incredible learning experience, it was a real eye-opener," she said. "After working in a residence hall in Southwest, there's nothing you can't do."

In her seven year span as an administrator, Radzik said she has made some necessary changes including providing consistent campus security and new staff organizational systems.

"My job is doing anything I can in an administrative capacity to make the jobs of the ISO's and escorts easier," she said.

Two years ago, Radzik polled residents and police about campus safety which resulted in additional lighting around residence halls.

"I think it's a safe campus if you use common sense. Use the services the campus provides and don't walk in unlit areas," she said.

"[Security workers] care about the students and staff of the campus," Radzik said. "I think that's something people forget when they see the ISO's out there."

The student escort service, which Radzik administers, is a prevention agency designed to offer escorts to students on campus who would otherwise be forced to walk alone.

"We've been called the eyes and ears of the University police. We're just out there to assist them," she said.

The University's grounds are patrolled by security workers, who wear green uniforms and patrol the campus to help alert police to suspicious or dangerous occurences 24 hours a day, 365 days a year, she said. "We want to provide the best possible security we can for the community we serve," she said.

Radzik said student alcohol abuse is one of the problems that plague security most. "Given that the Housing [department] has tightened up on regulations, parties have gone off campus."

But, she said, "We have to deal with it afterwards. Receptionists take a lot of abuse on weekend nights. It's a tough job."

Also, propping doors open in residence halls has become a serious issue, she said. "People love to come to college campuses and rip people off."

There are six female police officers on staff at UMass and female students comprise 52 percent of student security, but Radzik said security work is primarily a male dominated field.

"I think police work is a tough field, male or female, and I think it's commendable [that women are involved]," she said. "In any field not female dominated, you feel you have to do better than the men in it," she said.

"I am convinced that women can do anything they want to," she said.

Medical attention, counseling available for victims of rape

By JANINE MANCINELLI
Collegian Correspondent

Victims of rape and sexual assault at the University of Massachusetts may seek help through a system that combines the efforts of University Health Services, the Everywoman's Center, and the Department of Public Safety.

Two 24-hour hotlines and six physicians on-call at University Health Services cooperate to respond immediately to victims. The UMass police division offers a 24-hour rape hotline and 14 officers who are specially trained to counsel rape victims, said Mary Dumas, assistant director of the Division of Public Safety.

The hotline provides victims with information on what to do immediately and referrals to places where they can get counseling and other support.

"The division encourages victims to report rapes," Dumas said. "but no one is forced to prosecute."

But, she said, the reality is that sexual offenders do not attack only once and the perpetrator is usually only stopped by court intervention.

Larry Holmes, associate director of the Division of Public Safety said the officers must attend several certification courses to become qualified for sensitive crime work.

Once trained, said Dumas, "The officers provide training for people involved in general awareness. They do everything from preparing the community to direct interaction with victims."

The other 24 hour rape hotline is available through the Everywoman's Center, said Gretchen Krull, health educator at UHS.

The rape victim will speak to a counselor advocate at the hotline who is familiar with the system and who will encourage a medical exam, Krull said.

But, she said, "[the victim] must feel like they're in control."

The first step to recovery is giving the victim control of the situation, she said. "The counselor advocate's main duty is to give the victim all her options and support her," Krull said.

At UHS, six physicians have volunteered to be on call to respond to sexual assault cases and to perform the medical exam for victims after they have been assaulted, she said.

The medical exam includes checking for body injury, sexually transmitted diseases, and assessing risk for possible pregnancy, she said.

"The physician takes samples and gathers evidence that could be used in court," Krull said. "This kit is completely confidential and is placed in the 'sensitive' file."

The Everywoman's Center's educator/advocate program also provides workshops to increase community awareness about sexual assault," Krull said.

Surveys and police statistics demonstrate the need for such services at UMass.

In 1987, there were five rapes reported on the UMass campus and three rapes were reported in 1986," said Holmes.

However, Dumas said, surveys show a much higher rate of incidents than are reported to police. And, they are finding many of the offenders start at younger ages than they had expected.

One study, conducted between November 1984 and March 1985, by Ms. magazine and psychologist Mary P. Koss surveyed 6,100 college students on 32 campuses across the country, Krull said.

"The survey showed that 84 percent of the rape victims knew their attacker and 57 percent of the rapes were on dates," she said.

Also, the survey showed that one out of every twelve males had either committed or attempted acts that meet the legal definition of rape, she said.

Krull advised students to have clear communication on dates and be persistent with intentions.

"Be aware of situations around you. Have a plan in mind about getting out of a situation where you might be uncomfortable," she said.

Condoms marketed for women

By DANIELLE BIONDA
Collegian Correspondent

"Would You Buy A Condom For This Man?" asks a new advertisement geared toward increasing condom sales to women.

Beginning in late 1987, pharmaceutical companies specializing in birth control released a new line of 'specialized' condoms marketed toward women.

A spokesperson for the Today Personal Products Company said there is little difference between these specialized condoms and regularly sold condoms.

"The only difference between regular condoms and women's condoms is the packaging of the product," he said.

The specialized condom marketed toward women is more discreetly packaged than its predecessors. They are "color sensitive," he said, and come in pink and purple packages that "don't look like condoms."

The women's condom has found a definite audience in various womens' fashion and health magazines, said the spokesperson. Other condoms are not advertised in such an open manner, he said.

"I think women feel more comfortable with condoms they can buy themselves." he said.

Ann Grose, health educator for University Health Services, said there is a "definite increase" in the number of women buying condoms at the University.

In the contraception education sessions offered at UHS, she said, women are urged to use condoms and spermicides in conjunction with the birth control pill to protect against sexually transmitted diseases and AIDS.

Buying condoms without embarrassment has become easier at the UHS prescription desk, Grose said. "All you have to do is fill out a card, and the pharmacist puts the package in a bag for you," she said.

"It is very discreet, avoids embarrassment, and is much cheaper at Health Services" she said.

Latex condoms are sold three for $1 and spermicides range from $2 to $4 for gels and creams. Condoms and spermicides are sold at the UHS pharmaceutical desk Monday through Thursday from 8:30 a.m. to 8 p.m. and on Friday, 8:30 a.m. to 7 p.m. and on Saturday and Sunday from 9 a.m. to noon and from 1 p.m to to 4:30 p.m.

Kentucky chapter of NOW elects male president to office

LOUISVILLE, Ky (AP)— The Kentucky chapter of the National Organization for Women has elected Jim Newlin its president, making him the second man in the nation to lead a NOW chapter.

Newlin, who was elected Saturday and lives in nearby Henryville, Ind., said he joined NOW because "their cause covers just about everybody else's causes — equal rights for everyone, man woman and child."

He said he was the only man among 19 women when he attended his first NOW meeting, in 1985.

Although the members included him in its work immediately, he said, "they thought I was a spy. I felt I had to earn my stripes. Within two months, I had brought in 10 new members."

Former Kentucky NOW president Jean Varble said there may be "a few members who may not be comfortable with the idea" of a male president, but "We can't cut off half of the population."

Only the chapter in Washington, D.C., has had a male president.

Bailey's book looks at dating through the ages

By SUSAN RICHARDSON
Collegian Correspondent

From Front Porch to Back Seat
By Beth Bailey
Johns Hopkins Publishers

It is likely that female students at UMass 30 years ago would have been encouraged to take a course in Marriage Education. This is just one of the bizarre facts which Beth Bailey focuses on in From Front Porch to Back Seat, a book which deals with the ever-changing conventions of courtship in 20th century America.

Bailey's book is entertaining and readable. It pays special attention to the pattern of dating on college campuses over the years and it soon becomes evident that dating was rarely based on love or mutual attraction. Instead, the desire for power and popularity were the vital factors.

What is most striking is the way in which the balance of power between man and the woman changed over a period of 50 years. At the turn of the century, courtship was based upon young men "calling" on young ladies and it was the latter who were in control of the situation. "Etiquette books and columns were adamant on that point," Bailey states. "It was the 'girls priviledge' to ask a young man to call. Furthermore, it was highly improper for the man to take the initiative."

By mid-20th century, however, the situation had completely changed, due largely to the invention of the automobile. Dating moved from the public to the private spheres and it took place within the framework of the traditional sex roles. As Bailey says, "the woman demonstrated her need for protection and the man his ability to protect her."

With the man as the car owner and wage earner, it was expected that the woman be both physcically and mentally dependent on him. Dutch-dating was frowned upon by the majority of men and women alike because of its apparent threat to masculinity.

The second major change in the system of dating was brought about by the second World War. In the 1930's, dating was essentially competitve, a means of establishing one's popularity. Whether the boy or girl was charming or beautiful was irrelevant: young people simply aimed to arrange dates with as many different partners as possible. Bailey cites a comment in the editorial of The Collegian at this time to illustrate her point. It condemned the use of the library for "datemaking" and insisted that "the library is the place for the improvement of the mind and not the social standing of the studnet."

After World War II, however "going steady" became the tradition. The experience of war had changed the outlook of many young men and they now wanted some stability in their lives. Bizarre though it sounds, many magazines featured articles advising women as to how they should "Get A Husband," due to the scarcity of men at the time. "Look in the census reports for places with the most single men," was one suggestion. "Nevada has 125 males for every 100 female."

A chapter on the sexual revolution of the 60's would have given an additional perspective, but Bailey chooses, instead to offer some brief comments on the male-female relationships of the 80's. Anyone who has read From Front Porch to Back Seat must surely agree with her conclusion that for all "the vast uncertainites of contemporary coursthip," we have "made gains in freedom and equality."

Koppes album paves new path for the Church

By CHAD EDWARDS
Collegian Correspondent

Manchild and Myth
Peter Koppes
Rykodisc

Peter Kroppes, guitarist for the Austrailian group The Church, has just completed his solo, 15 track debut, Manchild and Myth, on the Rykodisc label. After Arista's successful release of Starfish, various Church band members have embarked upon solo projects. Lead singer and bassist, Steve Kilbey, as well as Marty Wilson-Piper, have produced numerous solo projects on a variety of labels. Unfortunately, The Church itself has yet to gain worldwide popularity, and to no surprise, many of the band members' solo projected have gone unnoticed.

The production of Manchild and Myth marks a new era for Church solo projects. Unlike Kilbey, Koppes has made a wholehearted attempt at straying away from the usual droning, psychedelic surrealism. Alternatively, Koppes has combined both fluvial melodies and reflective lyrics to make Manchild and Myth into a charming collection of accessible pop.

Like any other LP, Manchild and Myth sports an assortment of both likeable and ear-wrenching tunes. For example, side A kicks off to the guitar driven pop to "Take a Vow," which blends a tasteful array of interweaving melodies and percussion. Mediocrity takes the stage until "Quest" jumps to a start with a hard-edged guitar riff backed by a foot-stomping drum track. This dance-oriented gem then sets the mood for the classic new wave swing of "Comes As No Surprise" (which would come as no suprirse if Koppes had borrowed the concept from the glock of Seagull's "Space Age Love Song.")

On the other hand, "Opus" is an acrid display of monotonous synthesizer and drum machine patches - hardly an "ideal" way to initiate the B side of an album. Even "Our Love" becomes unlistenable with Koppes filing the track with resonance as he attempts to sing outside of his range.

Though hardly an established singer, Koppes displays a distinct flair for lyricism, as each tune is enshrouded in extraordinary themes of love and destiny. Surprisingly, almost all of the lyrics are written in simple rhyme, yet they are often deep and thought-provoking.

In its entirety Manchild and Myth shows intensity aside from the fact that it was conceived through both outdated instruments and studio techniques. While he has maintained a low profile within the context of The Church, Manchild and Myth shows Koppes to be both a talented and engaged lyricist/musician/producer in his own right. Although, had his efforts been backed by a major label, this solo effort might well have been a chart-busting album.

Music fans from Down Under have already been exposed to Manchild and Myth as it had just recently enjoyed a stint at the top of the Australian Indpendent charts. The CD version also features three extra tracks, taken from the Session EP, When Reason Forbids, released in 1987. Look for it.

Book takes a look at Revolution

By PEDRO PEREIRA

The First Salute
Barbara W. Tuchman
Alfred A. Knopf
300 pages

When the American ship "Andrew Doria" entered the Port of St. Eustatius in the West Indies Nov. 16, 1776, the crew fired a salute, to which the guns of the island's fort responded.

The response meant the American vessel, flying the red-and-white striped Continental Congress flag, had been recognized as coming from a legitimate nation, although the United States had yet to acquire independence.

Barbara W. Tuchman revolves the historical narrative of her most recent book, The First Salute, around this act, which led to belligerence between Holland and England. St. Eustatius was a Dutch colony.

Blending excerpts from journals, diaries, and letters by seafarers of the time with her own words, Tuchman describes how the Dutch, who claimed neutrality, aided the American colonies with weapons and other supplies in the war against England.

Using the salute, an otherwise trivial occurrence, as the focus point of a narrative about the American Revolution was a stroke of genius, but Tucker gets carried away with detail. She devotes entire chapters to the events that led to Holland's war with England and to France's preparation to aid the Americans.

The narrative becomes tedious at various points and looses the reader's interest simply because Tuchman packs too much information into each page.

The book lacks the personal touch that would capture the lay reader's attention. Perhaps if Tuchman had built the narrative around one central figure, mixing personal details with information about the person's direct involvement with the events, the book would have turned out more captivating.

She does, however, devote chapters to some of the men, such as Sir George Brydges Rodney, who played prominent roles in the events surrounding the revolution. But there is no attempt to look into the persons' characters in-depth, hence the lack of personal touch.

Nevertheless, Salute is valuable for its historical content. The author makes a successful attempt at linking developments in several countries to the American Revolution. However, unless you're a history buff, I wouldn't recommend this book.

Furbish's video to air from UVC

The Union Video is pleased to announce that it has been the central production facility for a new video-art tape which will premiere locally from Oct. 27 through Nov. 8.

The new tape is called "Which 1 is Green?" and strange but satisfying color-effects are part of its structure and message.

The tape began last Halloween with the informal taping of a party, wherein the camera-iris flared up with green each time it panned the lights.

This suggested a varied approach to color and pseudocolor, and there followed more than a dozen shooting sessions as well as the editing of several workprints. Initially everything was prepared for Halloween '88 - but election '88 appeared on the horizon - so the new tape becomes premiered with a sense of topicality for both these occasions.

The new tape was created by John Furbish, a long-time UVC member who has been doing video for about 15 years. His interest in video-art grew slowly, until he started workingwithcolor equipment in 1985. Since then he's exploded into his own primitive, passionate style of low-tech, high-impact speical effects. With Furbish's work, you'll see colors like you never would on the Turner network. In this tape you will be exposed to propoganda against money and pretense as well as humanistic messages about toleration and an economically - and environmentally - balanced "green earth."

This new tape is Furbish's fourth production for Amherst Community Television, but it is his first 2-facility production.

Documentary details Iran-Contra scandal

By GRAEME THOMSON
Collegian Correspondent

Cover-Up: Behind the Iran-Contra Affair
Opens at Pleasant St. Theater tonight

Chances are that the Iran-Contragate affair has faded in most people's memory. When it was in the headlines it all seemed a big joke, like some vast TV pantomime where the lines were pre-rehearsed on both sides of the house; designed to be unmemmorable in fact.

But now with the release of Cover-up, a very fascinating and very frightening documentary about the scandal, the truth should finally come to light. The material in cover-up and the allegations the film makes are potential political dynamite, especially in the light of the impending elections.

The film claims, among other things, that Reagan and Bush cut an arms deal with Iran in 1980, to delay the release of the US hostages and thus ensure Jimmy Carter's defeat in the November elections; that senior White House and Pentagon officials were aware that arms supply routes to the Contras were being used to ferry cocaine into the US - something which was suspiciously brushed over at the hearings - and that, perhaps most unnerving of all, a plan existed to suspend the US constitution in times of "emergency," such as US military intervention in Central America.

Although all of this information is available to the public, almost none of these allegations have been picked up by the mainstream media, a fact which makes Cover-Up all the more important.

The film is no lunatic left-wing scare crap either; its arguments are lucid and consistent and are backed up by former White House officials, CIA operatives and even an ex-Contra leader. Its implications are far-reaching; if this is to be believed, which I seriously suggest it is, than America is facing the greatest constitutional crisis in its history. The trail of terrorism, drug-running and corruption it traces leads right up to the President's door.

I strongly advise, as the publicity suggests, that you see this film before you vote, whether you be a liberal Democrat or a true-blue Minuteman. One thing is for sure, a vote for George Bush in the 1988 Presidential elections is a vote for the erosion of democracy.

The film opens tonight at Pleasant Street Theatre in Northampton.

Peddling Apartheid: South Africans hire American mouthpiece

By Suzette Hunte
Nummo Staff

Thomas A. Bolan former state Conservative Party chair and law partner of the late Roy Cohn and Ex-Bronx Democratic Boss Stanlley Friedman, has received close to a million dollars from South Africa to promote the interests of the apartheid government among national, state, and city officials. Although he is registered as a foreign agent with the federal government, he has no registered as may be required with the state.

New York State law requires persons hired to influence the passage or defeat of legislation, or state regulations, to register with the New York Temporary State Commision on Lobbying if they earn more than 2 thousand dollars for these activities. Since March 1986 Bolan has received 75 thousand dollars every three months from the South African government.

Bolan has received 75 thousand dollars every three months from the South African govenment. Bolan can be fined up to 5 thousand for violating the state law.

While opponents of apartheid have called on Westerners to withdraw their investments from firms doing business in South Africa Bolan has lobbied against divestiture.

While on retainer for South African government, Bolan donated over 16 thousand dollars to critical Republican racxes. Contributions to local campaiigns include: 1 thousand dollars to New Jersey Republican Pete Dawkins who is running against Senator Frank Lautenberg, a Democrat; 2thousand dollars to Jack Kemp's presidential and congressional campaign committees; 5 thousand to the Republican national political action committee, Victory '88, 1 thousand dollars to the Queens county State Senate campaign of current Conservative Party Chair, Serphin Maltese; and $1100 to Queens Assemblyman Douglas Prescott.

On behalf of South Africa, Bolan met with U.S. Senators Al D'Amato, Kemp and former Nevada Senator Paul Lazalt. Bolan is a member, and former chair of the committee, that helps D'Amato select his nomiinees for federal judgeships.

Most of Bolan's lobbying efforts have been focused on powerful New York Republicans, Comptroller Edward Regan, State Senators Roy Goodman and John Dunne, Prescott and Maltese. Regan has the authority to divest all state employees' pension funds from corporations doing business with South Africa, but has refused to do so.

Rob Jones, legislative director of American Committee on Africa, believes Bolan has been "shoring up opposition to the passage of a state divestment law,' which is stalled in the Republican-controlled state senate.

Bolan also met with Brooklyn Democrat Councilman Noach Dear, a week after Dear had arranged for New York Jewish leaders to meet with the consul general of the South African U.N. delegation(William Basstone, Voice, November 10,1987) One of Bolan's has been with Dr. Mose Durst, President of Rev. Sun Yung Moon's American Unification Church.

Bolan has lobbied his extensive list of political and media contacts without informing them that he is a paid agent for South Africa. "I didn't know he was a lobbyist,' said Michael Kramer, Chief Political Correspondent for U.S. News & World Report. "I knew he was interested, but he didn't say anything,' when he set up a meeting between Kramer and the South African vice-counsel. Monsignor Eugene Clark, pastor of St Agnew Roman Catholic Church, with whom Bolan arranged a meeting with South African officials, knew that bolan was involved in dealings with South African interests, but did not know that he was an agent.

In 1987 Bolan reportedly arranged and attended a meeting to introduce federal overseas private Investment Corporation(OPIC) board member-Evan Griffith Galbraith, former ambassador to France, to Leslie Manley, who was then South African UN ambassador, and a deputy. OPIC advises Americans looking for investments in Third World Countries. Bolan was a Reagan appointee to the OPIC board of directorsfrom 1982 through 1985. Federal regulations prohibit government employees and appointees from lobbying their former agencies on behalf of foreign or privaaaate interests.

CCEBMS: What have you done for us lately?

By Cardethia Moore
Nummo Staff

The Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and Minority Students, CCEBMS, has just enrolled the twenty first group of students into the program this fall. The class of 1992 in the program consists of 170 freshmen and a total enrollment of approximately 700 students.

According to Paul Barrows, who has been the director of the program for six and a half years, we have been averaging an enrollment of 200-220 freshmen each year, this year's enrollment was lower than it has been in the past. The university has recently reported an increase in minority student enrollment. The report gives the impression that there has been an increase in each of the minority groups when in fact the increase is attributed to a large enrollment of Asian students. Actually the enrollment for black students is lower than it has been in the past. Thus enrollment for black as well as Hispanic students has decreased and hopefully with more recruitment of minority students within the state as well as a resolution of past and present problems, minority enrollment will rise.

CCEBMS was first allocated for black students on the campus of the University of Massachusetts in 1968. The purpose of the program was to prepare incoming freshmen for the transition from high school to college.

With this process students involved in the CCEBMS Summer Program are required to live on campus in the dormitory for a six week program which allows the students to earn up to six credits. The program allows students to get a headstart on adjusting to the college atmosphere as well as earn academic credit toward graduation.

Upon entering the university, the advisors of the CCEBMS program place emphasis on sustaining the student in school and as the student moves through the program, the emphasis is shifted toward graduation and ensuring that all university and major requirements have been fulfilled.

The overall focus of the program is to provide students with sufficient academic support, which includes counseling and tutorial services. CCEBMS also provides an otherwise structured community among the students to combat the feeling of isolation due to the overwhelming size of the university. Mr. Barrows says " the biggest concern of the program is ensuring that ever resource available is made accessible to the students."

When asked about the CCEBMS program, several upperclassmen stated that it is understaffed and lacks the resources to provide students of the program with necessary assistance. One student defended the program as being in a "Catch 22" position of loosing large portions of the enrollment each semester, but lack of support and resources from the university to provide the students with the necessary assistance to sustain them in school.

Since 1968 the CCEBMS program has seen few changes and a consistent re-occurrence of attacks on individuals within the black community on campus. There has been little increase in the resources and funding for the program and the students. Mr. Barrows states, " we need to sustain our focus in order to obtain the results we want." The question remains to be answered, why has twenty years been allowed to pass and changes have not been made?

Gallery insures diversity

By Brett Andrews
Nummo Staff

Is cultural awareness something that students should attain while attending the University of Massachusetts? If so, a way in which student can do this is by participating in the various programs offered by the Augusta Savate Memorial Art Gallery.

THe art gallery is located on the first floor of the New Africa House in the Central Area, and is coordinated by Ms. Sharon Smith. Smith began to supervise the art gallery in September of 1988. She said the main objective of the art gallery is to promote Third World Art. "Most of the artwork exhibited is from Africa, Asia, Central America and South America' Smith said. Yet, Smith stated that although the gallery displays art from that part of the world, the shows are geared towards the entire student body. "THe gallery was created to serve the entire student body, and this is very important bbecause students not only learn about different cultures, but learn to respect these cultures as well.'

The art gallery was established by the auspices of Professor Femi Richards in 1971. Richards is currently teaching African art and art history at the University of Massachusetts.

Smith said participation can be very meaningful for students who take advantage of events offered in the gallery. "Students should participate in the gallery's events as well as make suggestions to the art gallery.

The gallery can offer a well rounded sense of cultural knowledge.

From October 12 to November 12, the art gallery will be having a photography exhibit titled, JOURNEY INTO THE SOUL SPIRITUAL BAPTIST OF BARBADOS.

For more information concerning the art gallery, contact Smith at 545-0932, or stop by.

UMass promotes respect on Civility Day

By Gina Sanon
Nummo Staff

Civility day is " the celebration of multicultural diversity" as proudly stated by Grant Ingle of the Human Relations Office. Civility Day was proposed as a commemoration of the racial brawl, which occurred on the planned day of activities, Oct. 27th two years ago. The purpose of the collaboration of activities is to focus on racism and increase awareness of a seemingly never ending struggle. Three goals for Civility Day have been set:
1.) to raise awareness about racism
2.) to celebrate multi-cultural diversity and finally,
3.) the highlight of new and existing resources to fight against racism.

Originally, Civility Day was scheduled as a one day event, but as the proposal became known to various organizations, more requests for participation enh ·ced the idea. Finally, the requests for participation became so great that the activities were scheduled for the week prior to Civility Day.

According to Grant Ingle, the idea of the Civility Day was a spin-off of the success of the Moratorium sponsored by the Graduate Student Senate last semester. The Moratorium was proposed as a result of several racial incidents that occurred last semester, as well as the re-occupation of the New Africa House. The Moratorium included a day of special activities such as lectures, workshops, films and class discussions about racism of which faculty, students and administration were encouraged to participate.

The Office of Human Relations reports approximately 80-100 events that will occur in support of Civility Day. These activities range from lectures, panel discussions, speakers, films, videos, art, radio shows, workshops, discussions in classrooms and possibly a theater presentation.
There will be workshops focusing on the connection between racism and sexism, ablism, anti-semitism and other "-isms". The house government of Orchard Hill is sponsoring a movie night in contribution. Within the administration office there will be discussions on racism in the workplace. In collaboration with the Vice Chancellor Office for Student Affairs, the Office of Human Relations is planning to co-sponsor a workshop directed to minority students, "Racial Harrasment: Where to go and What to do about it.''' These are just a few of the activities that will occurring beginning Friday Oct. 21st leading up to the climax Friday Oct. 27th— Civility Day. Enthusiastically, Ingle stressed " We encourage everyone to participate."

Phi Beta Sigma Week Activities

By Simone Nicholson
Nummo Staff

In their usual attention getting manner, Phi Beta Sigma Fraternity Inc. kicked off Sigma Week with the rabble rousing panel discussion, What the Hell is a black greek anyway?

The discussion began the week of September 26, which also included a forum on male/female relationships, a presentation of a Louis Farrfakhan video, their fall smaker, the annual Club Sig dance and a presentaiton by Dr. Frederick Jeffersan an multiculturalism.

The panel, which was organized much like a debate with pro and con sides, was made up of a variety of people representing different aspects of the black community, including members of black Greek organizations sitting on the Con side. Although it was seemingly balanced the audience was often frustrated by lack of recognition by the moderator and began to feel it was more a debate against the two sides than an exercise in education the community.

The lively discussion begain with Anthony Gee, a senior and member of Phi Beta Sigma Fraternity speaking for the apposing side said " the problem began with the organizations calling themselves greek, i.e. trying to be white." Debate insued with little opportunity for audience intervention. Charles Sheffield, a senior engineering major and member of Phi Beta Sigma fraternity sitting on the Pro side opposite his brother Gee stated " Black greeks have a tradition and a purpose. We shouldn't punish the founders far not knowing what the history of the letters was." David Walker a visiting alumni present at the discussion, said the panelists started off on a point of irrelevancy when they began to debate the title of the discussion with differing viewpoints on whether or not someone could be black and greek at the same time. He said that was not what the students had come to hear.

The audience comprised of about 80 students had come to find out what the fraternities and sororities were about and to hear what they were doing in the community. The question on what greeks are doing for the community was constantly recurring. Richard Gray, a junior and general manager of the Black Mass Communications Project, said, the panelists didn't answer the questians and that the forum was not organized so that the audience could participate. Lucas Wilson, a doctoral student in economics who sat on the opposing side, said that the panel became a forum for each different organization to defend themselves. He accused David Moore another Umass alumni and member of Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity, of bashing his organization because his experience has been less than pleasant and stated that " if his experience had been better he might be sitting on the other side."

The community service issue came to a close after Tony Walker, a senior and memeber of Kappa Alpha Psi who sat on the pro side said, that his fraternity never professed to be a public service organization because they were farmed as a support network for college men, although cammmunity service is one of their objectives. Lari Edmonds, senior, and member af Delta Sigma Theta Sorority said that many times the general body does not know what the organizations do because the greeks do not look far recognition.

Many members of the audience said that the discussion in the farm it took displayed the poorest sense of unity they had ever seen. Kim Holder, a graduate student, wanted to know why it is only in greek forums that people get so nasty when other times these same people are constantly talking about the unity needed within the community. Marc Codling-Davy a freshmen, political science major, said that the constant defense of the individual organizations was making people not want to join and believe in them. As a closing argument, David Walker, said that before the community stands up and chastises the greeks for not doing enough for the public good, they should ask themselves what had they done.

The forum lasted two hours and was held in room 176 in the campus center.

Though Bolan reported to the government that he met with Queens State Senator Frank Padavan on Behalf of the South Africans, the lawmaker dienies thje alleged February 27,1988 meeting took place. Padavan said Bolan's report was "off the wall.' Bolan also reported that he attended the American Legislarive Exchange Council annual conference, but Kimber Messersmith, an official with the conservative group, said the lobbyist's name did not appear on a list of conference attendees.

Bolan's filing lists his attendance at the April 1987 NY Conservative Party Conference and August 1987 Catholic War Veterans(CWV) conference in Florida. At both conferences Bolan, who serves as counsel to the veterans' organization, lobbied for proposals supportive of the South African Government. Additionally he has arranged pro-South Africa activities for the East Side Conservative club of which he is founder and current president. Bolan did not return Voice phone calls.

New World Theater Presents: Dark Cowgirls and Prairie Queens

Ramani Stripada
Nummo Staff

"Dark Cowgirls and Prairie Queens" is a depiction of seven black women and their confrontations with freedom. To them the West is the promise land and freedom is the dream. Through the narrations by a character named James we learn the tales of these women.

Mary is known for her brutality. She tells an amusing story of the time she was run down by a pack of wolves. She stood there face to face with them until they backed down.

An ex-slave woman is taken to court by her white neighbor for singing. She sings old slave songs very poorly, because they are all she knows. The court says that there is no law against singing, so they offer her singing lessons. The neighbor likes opera, therefore the woman sings the same slave song lyrics in opera.

Edmonia Lewis wants to have some fun with her friends so she adds a little something extra into the wine. The girls get awfully sick and are taken to the doctor's. He diagnoses that they have been poisoned.

Dark Cowgirls and Prarie Queens

Edmonia is accused of poisoning her friends and is appointed a lawyer.
Her lawyer tells her she must prove to the court that she has a worthwhile skill to offer the community. She tells him of her dream to become a sculpturer. He discourages her, but Edmonia remains adament on paying tribute to black heros through sculptures. Once she is freed, Edmonia sculptes those statues and is admired for her fine art work.

Betty Mason is a slave woman who walks from Mississippi to California behind three hundred cattle and wagons. In California one can be free, but a owner can retrieve his runaway slave or he can live there with his slaves. Betty wants her freedom; she is willing to wrestle her master for it. She imagines being free and dreams of a home of her own. Betty tries to gain her freedom, but is thrown into jail with her friends.
There she struggles to keep them thankful for what they have. In the courtroom she speaks of her need to be free. That day her master is sent home minus fourteen slaves. Betty achieves success and is able to build a nursing home.

Julia Boulette is a beautiful woman who wears diamonds and furs. She makes her living being a hooker for the mining men. A common woman approaches her is hopes of a parnership, but Julia refuses the offer. The woman is angered and reminds Julia that she is a common hooker underneath her diamonds and furs. The woman goes on to say that no one will care when Julia dies. Julia claims that when she dies she will be marched to her burial ground. When Julia does die all her diamonds and furs are stolen, but does receive the march to her burial ground.

These are just some of the imaginative stories James tells us. He says that though these tales are not completely true they very well could be. And they are a reminder to him of the struggle his people had and still must go through.

The facts about Mozambique

By Suzette Hunte
Nummo Staff

"Mozambique and the war in Southern Africa", a discussion that took place on Wednesday, October 5th in the second floor lounge of the Gorman dormitory featuring Malics and Sytse Tjellingii, teachers from Mozambique, was a prime example of the old addage, "You can't judge a book by its cover".

When confronted with the sight of this caucasian couple who professed to being Quakers from Holland, I was extremely dissappointed. Where were the brother and sister I expected dressed in the garb of my ancestor's homeland?

I was prepared to hear excerpts from their triumps in sucessfully colonizing and educating the native's of Mozambique out of their heritage and culture with examples of how they rescued the people of Mosambique from certain death. Fortunately, I was wrong.

Between the literature they distributed and the discussion they inspired, the Tjeillingiis imparted as much information as humanly possible in a two hour period.

The couple decided to address the dual topic of Mozambique and the war in South Africa because they felt "The two are as one; one could not exist without the other".

Why?

Mozambique, with a population of 15 million, gained its independence on June 25,1975.

Under the leadership of their late president, Samora Machel, FRELIMO, the all-Black government of Mozambique, was established and proved to be extremely sucessful.

Mozambique under its rule was able to rid herself of forced labor, discrimination, insured freedom of speech, and encouraged large scale participation in political decisions by her people.

Frelimo also made advances in the areas of education, health, and in agriculture.

Today this country is in a state of war due to the exploits of RENAMMO, a South Afikaan supported anti-government destabilization movement whose sole purpose is to destroy the economic, political, and military institutian's of Mozambique and the other countries neighboring South Africa.

Why?

According to the Tjeillingiis, the South Afrikaans have a vested interest in seeing a weak Mozambique, "A strong Mozambique government would be a good example of how this could work in South Africa and they don't want that so they are trying to destabilize it as much as they can".

And destabilize they have with South Afrika's RENAMO causing an estimated $10 billion in damage to the countries neighboring South Africa between 1980 and 1984 alone.

How does South Africa recruit Black South Africans to fill RENAMO's ranks?

According to Malies Tjeillingii, inside Mozambique many men and children are kidnapped and forced to commit cruelties against their own people. In South Africa, many Mozambicans are picked up by South Afrikaan police and put into prison. Here they are visited by RENAMO officals who drug, blackmail or beat these prisoners until they join RENAMO.

According to the Tjeillingiis, one of the most effective ways of stopping this madness is by sanctions.

Sanctions are actions taken by governments or individuals to express their disapproval, punish, or modify the behavior of another country, most often in the form of economic measures, that impose penalties on other states.

A main argument of the South African government and a common misconception held by some persons of this country, by U.S. corporations, and by the Regan administration, is that Black South Africans would be the first to be hurt by sanctions.

This argument ignores the fact that sanctions will deal a serious blow to the economic well being of affluent white South Afrikaans which can have a significant political effect on the South African Government.

Proponents of this argument concern themselves with the short as opposed to the long term picture. The effects of

BLACK WOMAN
Black Woman! Oh beautiful Black Woman
Where do you go from here?
You with you kinky short cut hair.
Have you been through the ropes, the way they say?
Have you lived from hand to mouth, from day to day?
You don't have to answer, I can see.

Black Woman! Oh beautiful Black Woman
Are you as tired as you look?
Your body bent, eyes wide and lined
Have your bent, eyes wide and lined
Have your breast the strength for another child to suck?
Have you the nerve for another man to pluck?
You don't have to answer, I can see.

Black Woman! Oh Beautiful Black Woman
Why do you sit there night after night?
Your hands veined, crocked and black
Is it from washing the one dress you wear on your back?
You don't have to answer, I can see.

Black Woman! Oh beautiful Black Woman
Where do you go from here?
Will you just sit in your worn cushioned chair?
Heart heavy, not a soul to care
You don't have to answer, I can see.

The Sounds of South Africa

By Simone Nicholson

The place, the Paramount Performing Arts Center in Springfield. The time, 8 p.m. on Friday Sept. 23. The stars, Hugh Masakela and Miriam Makeba. The reaction, OUTSTANDING!

After a retirement of almost twenty years Miriam Makeba is back doing what she knows best, singing the songs of her native South Africa. They say music is best when it comes from the heart, Makeba certainly proves that when she sings the traditional African songs as well as when she plays tribute to those talented musicians who have spent their lives in the townships of South Africa, never being able to show the world their love and creativity.

Masakela, whose narrative of the destructive situations of South Africa silenced the audience, has an even greater talent than his remarkable playing and storytelling; he is a master of arrangement. When he mixes the calypso, reggae, ultimately carribean beats with those of his native country and fuses them all with classic jazz there arrives a style of music that makes the audience understand the motives behind it.

Makeba and Masakela could not have chosen a more perfect time to come back into the spotlight. The rising awareness of South Africa's plight will make their music absolutely essential to furthering the message of the struggle of their people. It is strongly encouraged that anyone with a love for the people and their struggle as well as an appreciation for jazz with a twist, make an effort to listen and learn from Makeba and Masakela.

The staff of Nummo News, the only Black affairs newspaper at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, is pleased to welcome you all to the five college communities of the Pioneer Valley. We hope that you had an enjoyable summer, and are now ready to approach the fall semester with a great deal of enthusiasm resulting in substantial academic progress.

This letter is an appeal to all Black students especially, but not exclusively, from the five local schools of higher education who are interested in communicating their concerns, ideas and needs to other students by contributing to the Nummo News publication in any number of journalistic positions available on the newspaper. Our goal in this effort is to establish a five college network so that Black students from each school can express their views to their Black peers in particular, and to all students from all ethnic origins in general.

Nummo News was founded in 1975, when Black students realized that there was no Black representation on any of the five college newspapers. They protested by staging a sit-in at the UMass Collegian. Their efforts were effective in winning two editorial positions on the publication. This was the conception of the "Black Affairs" page in the Collegian

However, the Black student community did not find the Collegian's endeavors substantial and the following year they established Nummo News. "Nummo," a Swahili word is defined as, "the magic power of the spoken and written word." The early years at Nummo News were most successful. Unfortunately, due to a lack of community support and student commitment, the newspaper has developed more than its share of problems. This year, having identified many of the publication's problems, it is our intention to bring the newspaper back up to the standards of high quality established during the 1970's. One such method is going to be the inclusion of local, national and international news stories and issues relevant to the Black community.

The current staff at Nummo News, although inexperienced (many of us have only been associated with the publication for about one year), is dedicated to bringing the newspaper back to life. It is imperative that the important issues of social conscience are not overlooked or underestimated, but rather, continue to occupy the growing, impressionable young minds of the world. Only then can we hope to change the globe for the better for all peoples!

Therefore, we encourage you to actively participate in the production of Nummo News and help us to establish a five College network, of and for, the Black student community. The Nummo News staff holds meetings every Thursday, 5:15 p.m. in our office at 103 New Africa House on the UMass campus. The telephone number is: 545-0061. If you have any questions feel free to call the office.

Last Wednesdays meeting of the Undergraduate Student Senate yielded unanimous ratifications of the senatorial election results, a report on the outcome of the referandum question and allocation of funds to three student organizations.

After ratifying the election results, the senate asked the results of the referencum question offered with the senate ballots. The question, "Should the police substation in Washington Tower be removed?" received 1,011 "yes" votes and 382 "no" votes. Karen Flanagan, a governmental affairs committee co-chair felt that if the question were read more thoroughly, the student body would have voiced a more unequivocal rejection of the situation.

As the senate was entering a new session, it had to elect new members to the Governmental Affairs committee. Chosen from eleven candidates, Tracy Davis, Todd Lever, Karen Flanagan and John Dunlap emerged as the victors. Their first duty as committee members will be to select two more members to join them on the committee.

On the issue of fund allocations, heavy debate was the order of the day. The proposals made by the finance committee would allocate 1,500 dollars to the Black Mass Communications Project for the upcoming Big Daddy Kane concert, 1,000 dollars to the African-American Stuoent Association for the upcoming Boys Club of Harlem Choir concert, and 2,750 dollars to re-emburse Southwest Area Government for a copier it purchased over the summer. Treasurer Laura Filkins spearheaded a drive to separate the move into two sections; one containing the BMCP and Afro-Am requests and the other containing the Southwest Area Government re-embursement request. When asked why she requested this action, Treasurer Filkins said she took issue with an area government abandoning prodedure, making a financial commitment and then requesting re-embursment. Their opposition led by Jhonathan Grant, claimed that they (SWAG) tried to push their financial request through the senate, but time constraints made it necessary for them to forego procedure by the copier unassisted. After a heated debate, Southwest Area Government received the money it requested but left much animosity on both sides.

Finally, in an attempt to solve the ongoing issue of the presidency Senators Bob Monaghan and Meridith Madison asked to suspend the rules and call for another election. The motion was narrowly defeated and will probably remain a continuing point of debate at future senate meetings.

"Another thing students can do is contact their senators and tell them to support S-2378. The Dellums/Cranston Bill, for comprehensive economic sanctions against South Africa", said Sytse.

The couple ended their discussion with the sad but true statement, "The struggle continues".

To whom it may concern

'Liberal' is not a four letter word

It's funny how over time the meaning of words change. For example, take the word liberal.

What?! That's the "L" word. Boo! Hiss! Tell him to shut up!

Yes, it's the "L" word. But it hasn't always been the "L" word. Only recently has it developed a negative connotation. Not so long ago, someone who was regarded as a liberal in American politics was respected for his/her desire to push past the status quo for the betterment of everyone.

But over the years the word's meaning has changed. Now, thanks to George Bush and Co., a liberal is a heinous, demon-possessed, inhuman creature, whose ultimate goal is to set free all of the killers, rapists, and robbers in prisons across the country.

It's too bad. A really decent word in our language, which has a Latin root meaning "free," has been destroyed. What's worse is that by playing off the word's new, negative definition and labeling Dukakis with it, it appears that Bush has been able to seal up an election victory for himself.

It's Dukakis' fault. At the last presidential debate, why didn't he pull out a dictionary and politely say: "Excuse me George, but you've called me a liberal ten times tonight. I was wondering which definition of the word do you mean: A*belonging to, or befitting one that is a gentleman in social rank,* B*marked by generosity, and openhandedness,* or C)not bound by authoritarianism, orthodoxy, or traditional or established forms of action, attitude, or opinion?"

Bush would have stood there, his confident look would have vanished, and his normal dumbfoundedness and insecurity would have returned.

Bob Bobala

Then Dukakis could have said, "Actually, it really doesn't matter. I consider myself a gentleman — I'm sure Kitty wouldn't have married me if I was anything else but a gentleman. I'm open-minded, and I try to be as generous as I can. And as a matter of fact, I'm not satisfied living in an America that has a trillion dollar national debt, or a government that deals arms to Iran and does business with a Panamanian drug dealer. I'm all for change George. I'm all for it."

Instead, Dukakis tried to project himself as a moderate. Throughout the campaign he has attempted to shed his liberal image and make himself seem more conservative.

But he has been unsuccessful, and Bush has pegged him as a "card-carrying member of the ACLU." What a fiend! Dukakis supports the American Civil Liberties Union! He supports an organization that was founded to protect us — liberals and conservatives alike — from infringement upon our rights which are guaranteed to us in the first ten amendments of the constitution.

I like the way Bush has singled out Massachusetts as the only state that has a prison furlough program. He's made Dukakis seem like the wicked governor of the East, who lets murderers out on the streets so they can kill again. Why hasn't anyone mentioned that forty other states have the same type of program, including California (when a certain conservative person was governor there)?

"Dukakis is a liberal!" the Bush camp has screamed at us. "He's going to eliminate our national defense, raise taxes, and give all of our money away. He's evil!"

Unless Dukakis drastically turns things around over the next couple of weeks, it looks like we've got four more years of Reaganomics ahead of us. You can decide if that's good or bad. But it's a shame that Bush's campaign has helped to solidify a negative meaning for a decent word.

If this country never had any liberal leaders, slavery would still be an institution here, women would never have gotten the right to vote, and America would never have landed on the moon.

The true meaning of the word "liberal" has been lost forever. Start rewriting the dictionaries.

Danish not just a pastry

Imagine: a ball is suspended from the ceiling of a room. Half of it is painted blue and half is red. Now, you and your friends are in one corner of the room and can only see the blue half of the ball, so you assume the entire ball is blue. My friend and I are in the other corner of the room, where we can see only the red side of the ball, so we assume the ball to be red. Each side shouts at the other about who is correct and nothing is accomplished. If both sides simply walked directly under the suspended ball, then we would all realize that there are in fact, alternatives other than purely right and purely wrong.

Scott Green

I am writing from Copenhagen, Denmark, where I am on exchange. I have only been here four short weeks, but so far, my European education has given me alternative views on issues that we are used to viewing in an American slant. The things I took for granted at home I am suddenly beginning to question.

I used to think of Americans as being the good guys and Soviets as being the bad guys. Why? Because democracy is good and communism is bad, obviously. This is as ridiculous as saying that I hate Jews because I like Arabs.

I thought playing "ball" meant baseball, not soccer. I thought "Danish" was a pastry, not a language.

Why was I so ignorant? Socialization is mainly to blame — the process that makes us believe what we think is right for the wrong reasons. It teaches us that ignorance is in fact bliss.

People must muster the courage to walk away from the security of their respective niches and create an atmosphere of mutual respect and understanding, even when faced with seemingly insurmountable bipolar points of view.

At home, I thought I was so confident about where I stood on certain issues. Now, I am constantly evaluating my former convictions. It appears that Americans are generally not privy to the international climate or its peculiarities. The vastness of the United States and the similarity of our closest friend Canada, has insulated us from an unbiased exchange of ideas.

Looking at the world through a very different window is academically enriching and culturally enhancing. I recommend living abroad for a period of time either on your own or through the National Student Exchange program. It is truly a challenge and an adventure you won't soon forget.

Passing spurns Texaco

We are in the midst of midterms. It's a hellish week, full of tests, term papers, and research. This week will make or break us. What we have done, or haven't done, in the past six weeks will be measured all in one, or if people are lucky, five days if their tests are spread out.

Alise S. Harfield

Mine aren't. I have three midterms in two days. So why, you ask, am I wasting time writing this when I should be slaving over Taoism in East Asian History and memorizing the speeches of the Pilgrims in the Canterbury tales (in Middle English, no less)?

Simple. When I flunk out of college this week, I'll need something, anything, to put on the resume I'll be handing to the man dressed in navy dickies with his name sewn on his greasy shirt when I plead with him to let me work at his gas station. Just in case he may need some proof that I indeed spent two intense years trying to become educated, then threw it all away to to join his Texaco team, I will give him this.

If the gas man thinks I am under qualified for having flunked my way to his establishment, I have listed a bunch of alternative places I will go to. This is also for your benefit; it will provide you with a picture of where you may be next week when the grades come out.

- Wifred beauty Academy. We've all seen the commercials on channel 56 for this Boston-based establishment. Everyone looks so happy there, as if it were a no-stress environment. It offers low tuition, a short program that beats four never-ending years here, free hair spray throughout the program, and best of all, a chance to be on the commercial that runs daily (acting ability not required).

- If you cringe at the thought of your hands in other people's hair, try plunging them into their trash. The job includes free transportation (mittens and a hat are suggested, you have to ride outside of the truck), no parking to worry about, you can pick your own neighborhood to work in, and best of all, you get first dibs of quality stuff. If you see something that would furnish your place in a unique way, just take it. It's free. What a fringe benefit!

My last suggestion for us flunkies is the corner. Any corner. This job is the oldest, and as I understand, the best paying. You can set your own hours. You get to wear funky outfits, and show your creativity that a class like statistics kept locked away. This job has equal opportunity; the only thing required is a pulse. You meet tons of people, and you don't need to go to a keg party to do it.

If anyone is interested in going to any of these places with me, I'll give you until next week to see the results of your tests. Hurry up. At the rate I'm going, I'll beat you there.

The 'right' is wrong

Last March when my co-senator and I decided to run for one of the two seats in Van Meter residence hall, we thought we would stay "non-partisan" and not get involved in any of the name calling that occurs so frequently between the "left" and "right" factions of the Student Government Association.

Edward Chambers

For almost a semester and a half we had heard all sorts of horror stories about this three-ring circus known as the Undergraduate Student Senate and read numerous editorials about how ridiculous both sides were. So when we were elected we decided not to align ourselves with either side. We went to our first senate meeting firmly believing that we would hold our ground.

Well that stand lasted barely one senate meeting because by that time it had become very obvious who was "right," and who was serious. I watched with amazement as the "conservative" faction prevented anything from getting done.

As long as I have been a student senator these self-described "conservatives" have done nothing — they have offered no solutions, and no leadership on student issues. They have spent their time blasting the radical leftist administration and the "crazy liberals" of the senate. And since they have no real power in the senate, they get nothing accomplished. The only thing they do manage to do is hold things up by filibustering and sometimes spend an entire meeting debating and amending one motion that they don't agree with. This keeps the senate from addressing more important issues and it is irresponsible and totally unproductive.

The only student issue I have seen them take a stand on is Financial Aid — they are opposed to it, even though 75 percent of the students at UMass benefit from it.

If these senators want to be the bastion of conservatism at a predominantly liberal campus — great. I have no problem with that and I doubt highly that anyone on either side of the political fence would deny that is their right, but all too often they use their minority status as a defense for their behavior, which at its worst can be oppressive; at best unproductive.

Unfortunately, because I have decided to be a "progressive" senator and not "regressive" I have been branded a "liberal" — but I feel that this is a small price to pay for representing the mainstream attitudes of the students of this University.

Scientist says Mars is a lesson for humans

By YANA DLUGY
Collegian Staff

Ever notice when people talk about extraterrestrial beings they often refer to them as "martians?" This fascination with Mars dates back to ancient times when our ancestors feared the close approach of the bloody planet, believing it caused war.

William Dent, professor in the Physics and Astronomy Department, has been fascinated with the fourth planet in our solar system for at least 20 years now.

Although there is no life on Mars now, Dent said there is a good chance that at some time, the planet contained living things.

"Mars is a planet that has died," Dent said.

By studying and observing Mars and trying to understand it, "we can understand our own planet better, and by understanding our planet better, we can avoid the same catastrophe of Mars and Venus."

Dent said the Earth's atmosphere has been polluted extensively, because "people are treating the atmosphere like a sewer."

A large swing in temperature on Earth, more than one degree a decade, results in what is known as the "greenhouse effect," which contributes to drought and an increase in cases of skin cancer.

"The average global temperature of Earth has been climbing for the past 100 years not due to the orbit of Earth, but the gases civilizations are dumping into the atmosphere," Dent said.

Unlike our forefathers, Dent is thrilled when Mars gets close to the Earth. "When Mars is closest to the Earth, I get the strongest [radio] signals, which increases the accuracy of measurements," he said.

Mars got the closest to the Earth since 1971 on Sept. 21, and Dent said it will not be that close again until 2003.

Mars, unlike Earth, orbits the sun in an eccentric path. Once in every 15-17 years, the planet is closest to the sun and in straight planetary alignment with both the sun and the Earth. This lineup is called "favorable opposition" by scientists.

One of the main objectives of Dent's research is determining the depth of the permafrost on Mars. Permafrost is frozen water in the Martian soil.

Dent's research with permafrost now could help Soviet cosmonauts survive the first space trip to Mars twenty years from now.

Because there is no liquid water on Mars, the Soviets will have to take enough oxygen, food and water for three years on, if their 2015 expedition is successful, Dent said.

"If we can find water on Mars, they don't have to take as much," he said. "So it would be important to know if one can get at ice, if it isn't too deep, and melt it and turn it into water."

Dent said his research up to date indicates that the permafrost is more than one-meter deep in the soil.

The professor is also trying to calculate the rate of global temperature change on Mars. The average minus-50-degree Fahrenheit soil temperature on the planet has varied less than 3 degrees, since Dent started his research in 1968. However, more accurate measurements over a longer period are needed to determine how stable the temperature is, he said.

"If we can understand the changes in Martian climate, it will help us to understand the changes in our own," Dent said. Mars has a "simpler" climate than Earth because it does not have bodies of water, which require scientists to factor in heat exchange, Dent said.

Dent searches for permafrost and long-term temperature changes on Mars by observing the shortest possible radio wavelengths emitted by the planet. The wavelengths, between three and nine millimeters long, are caused by the motion of atoms and molecules in the soil, he said.

Peddling Apartheid: South Africans hire American mouthpiece

By Suzette Hunte
Nummo Staff

Thomas A. Bolan former state Conservative Party chair and law partner of the late Roy Cohn and Ex-Bronx Democratic Boss Stanley Rriedman, has received close to a million dollars from South Africa to promote the interests of the apartheid government among national, state, and city officials. Although he is registered as a foreign agent with the federal government, he has no registered as may be required with the state.

New York State law requires persons hired to influence the passage or defeat of legislation, or state regulations, to register with the New York Temporary State Commision on Lobbying if they earn more than 2 thousand dollars for these activities. Since March 1986 Bolan has received 75 thousand dollars every three months from the South African government.

Bolan has received 75 thousand dollars every three months from the South African govenment. Bolan can be fined up to 5 thousand for violating the state law.

While opponents of apartheid have called on Westerners to withdraw their investments from firms doing business in South Africa Bolan has lobbied against divestiture.

While on retainer for South African government, Bolan donated over 16 thousand dollars to critical Republican racxes. Contributions to local campaiigns include: 1 thousand dollars to New Jersey Republican Pete Dawkins who is running against Senator Frank Lautenberg, a Democrat; 2thousand dollars to Jack Kemp's presidential and congressional campaign committees; 5 thousand to the Republican national political action committee, Victory '88, 1 thousand dollars to the Queens county State Senate campaign of current Conservative Party Chair, Serphin Maltese; and $1100 to Queens Assemblyman Douglas Prescott.

On behalf of South Africa, Bolan met with U.S. Senators Al D'Amato, Kemp and former Nevada Senator Paul Lazalt. Bolan is a member, and former chair of the committee, that helps D'Amato select his nomiinees for federal judgeships.

Most of Bolan's lobbying efforts have been focused on powerful New York Republicans, Comptroller Edward Regan, State Senators Roy Goodman and John Dunne, Prescott and Maltese. Regan has the authority to divest all state employees' pension funds from corporations doing business with South Africa, but has refused to do so.

Rob Jones, legislative director of American Committee on Africa, believes Bolan has been "shoring up opposition to the passage of a state divestment law,' which is stalled in the Republican-controlled state senate.

Bolan also met with Brooklyn Democrat Councilman Noach Dear, a week after Dear had arranged for New York Jewish leaders to meet with the consul general of the South African U.N. delegation(William Basstone, Voice, November 10,1987) One of Bolan's has been with Dr. Mose Durst, President of Rev. Sun Yung Moon's American Unification Church.

Bolan has lobbied his extensive list of political and media contacts without informing them that he is a paid agent for South Africa. "I didn't know he was a lobbyist,' said Michael Kramer, Chief Political Correspondent for U.S. News & World Report. "I knew he was interested, but he didn't say anything,' when he set up a meeting between Kramer and the South African vice-counsel. Monsignor Eugene Clark, pastor of St Agnew Roman Catholic Church, with whom Bolan arranged a meeting with South African officials, knew that bolan was involved in dealings with South African interests, but did not know that he was an agent.

In 1987 Bolan reportedly arranged and attended a meeting to introduce federal overseas private Investment Corporation(OPIC) board member-Evan Griffith Galbraith, former ambassador to France, to Leslie Manley, who was then South African UN ambassador, and a deputy. OPIC advises Americans looking for investments in Third World Countries. Bolan was a Reagan appointee to the OPIC board of directorsfrom 1982 through 1985. Federal regualations prohibit government employees and appointees from lobbying their former agencies on behalf of foreign or privaaaate interests.

CCEBMS: What have you done for us lately?

By Cardethia Moore
Nummo Staff

The Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and Minority Students, CCEBMS, has just enrolled the twenty first group of students into the program this fall. The class of 1992 in the program consists of 170 freshmen and a total enrollment of approximately 700 students.

According to Paul Barrows, who has been the director of the program for six and a half years, we have been averaging an enrollment of 200-220 freshmen each year, this year's enrollment was lower than it has been in the past. The university has recently reported an increase in minority student enrollment. The report gives the impression that there has been an increase in each of the minority groups when in fact the increase is attributed to a large enrollment of Asian students. Actually the enrollment for black students is lower than it has been in the past. Thus enrollment for black as well as Hispanic students has decreased and hopefully with more recruitment of minority students within the state as well as a resolution of past and present problems, minority enrollment will rise.

CCEBMS was first allocated for black students on the campus of the University of Massachusetts in 1968. The purpose of the program was to prepare incoming freshmen for the transition from high school to college.

With this process students involved in the CCEBMS Summer Program are required to live on campus in the dormitory for a six week program which allows the students to earn up to six credits. The program allows students to get a headstart on adjusting to the college atmosphere as well as earn academic credit toward graduation.

Upon entering the university, the advisors of the CCEBMS program place emphasis on sustaining the student in school and as the student moves through the program, the emphasis is shifted toward graduation and ensuring that all university and major requirements have been fulfilled.

The overall focus of the program is to provide students with sufficient academic support, which includes counseling and tutorial services. CCEBMS also provides an otherwise structured community among the students to combat the feeling of isolation due to the overwhelming size of the university. Mr. Barrows says " the biggest concern of the program is ensuring that ever resource available is made accessible to the students."

When asked about the CCEBMS program, several upperclassmen stated that it is understaffed and lacks the resources to provide students of the program with necessary assistance. One student defended the program as being in a "Catch 22" position of loosing large portions of the enrollment each semester, but lack of support and resources from the university to provide the students with the necessary assistance to sustain them in school.

Since 1968 the CCEBMS program has seen few changes and a consistent re-occurrence of attacks on individuals within the black community on campus. There has been little increase in the resources and funding for the program and the students. Mr. Barrows states, " we need to sustain our focus in order to obtain the results we want." The question remains to be answered, why has twenty years been allowed to pass and changes have not been made?

Gallery insures diversity

By Brett Andrews
Nummo Staff

Is cultural awareness something that students should attain while attending the University of Massachusetts? If so, a way in which student can do this is by participating in the various programs offered by the Augusta Savate Memorial Art Gallery.

THe art gallery is located on the first floor of the New Africa House in the Central Area, and is coordinated by Ms. Sharon Smith. Smith began to supervise the art gallery in September of 1988. She said the main objective of the art gallery is to promote Third World Art. "Most of the artwork exhibited is from Africa, Asia, Central America and South America' Smith said. Yet, Smith stated that although the gallery displays art from that part of the world, the shows are geared towards the entire student body. "THe gallery was created to serve the entire student body, and this is very important bbecause students not only learn about different cultures, but learn to respect these cultures as well.'

The art gallery was established by the auspices of Professor Femi Richards in 1971. Richards is currently teaching African art and art history at the University of Massachusetts.

Smith said participation can be very meaningful for students who take advantage of events offered in the gallery. "Students should participate in the gallery's events as well as make suggestions to the art gallery.

The gallery can offer a well rounded sense of cultural knowledge.

From October 12 to November 12, the art gallery will be having a photography exhibit titled, JOURNEY INTO THE SOUL SPIRITUAL BAPTIST OF BARBADOS.

For more information concerning the art gallery, contact Smith at 545-0932, or stop by.

UMass promotes respect on Civility Day

By Gina Sanon
Nummo Staff

Civility day is " the celebration of multicultural diversity" as proudly stated by Grant Ingle of the Human Relations Office. Civility Day was proposed as a commemoration of the racial brawl, which occurred on the planned day of activities, Oct. 27th two years ago. The purpose of the collaboration of activities is to focus on racism and increase awareness of a seemingly never ending struggle. Three goals for Civility Day have been set:
1.) to raise awareness about racism
2.) to celebrate multi-cultural diversity and finally,
3.) the highlight of new and existing resources to fight against racism.

Originally, Civility Day was scheduled as a one day event, but as the proposal became known to various organizations, more requests for participation enh ced the idea. Finally, the requests for participation became so great that the activities were scheduled for the week prior to Civility Day.

According to Grant Ingle, the idea of the Civility Day was a spin-off of the success of the Moratorium sponsored by the Graduate Student Senate last semester. The Moratorium was proposed as a result of several racial incidents that occurred last semester, as well as the re-occupation of the New Africa House. The Moratorium included a day of special activities such as lectures, workshops, films and class discussions about racism of which faculty, students and administration were encouraged to participate.

The Office of Human Relations reports approximately 80-100 events that will occur in support of Civility Day. These activities range from lectures, panel discussions, speakers, films, videos, art, radio shows, workshops, discussions in classrooms and possibly a theater presentation.

There will be workshops focusing on the connection between racism and sexism, ablism, anti-semitism and other "-isms". The house government of Orchard Hill is sponsoring a movie night in contribution. Within the administration office there will be discussions on racism in the workplace. In collaboration with the Vice Chancellor Office for Student Affairs, the Office of Human Relations is planning to co-sponsor a workshop directed to minority students, "Racial Harrasment: Where to go and What to do about it." These are just a few of the activities that will occurring beginning Friday Oct. 21st leading up to the climax Friday Oct. 27th— Civility Day. Enthusiastically, Ingle stressed " We encourage everyone to participate."

Phi Beta Sigma Week Activities

By Simone Nicholson
Nummo Staff

In their usual attention getting manner, Phi Beta Sigma Fraternity Inc. kicked off Sigma Week with the rabble rousing panel discussion. What the Hell is a black greek anyway?

The discussion began the week of September 26, which also included a forum on male/female relationships, a presentation of a Louis Farrfakhan video, their fall smoker, the annual Club Sig dance and a presentaiton by Dr. Frederick Jefferson on multiculturalism.

The panel, which was organized much like a debate with pro and con sides, was made up of a variety of people representing different aspects of the black community, including members of black Greek organizations sitting on the Con side. Although it was seemingly balanced the audience was often frustrated by lack of recognition by the moderator and began to feel it was more a debate against the two sides than an exercise in education the community.

The lively discussion begain with Anthony Gee, a senior and member of Phi Beta Sigma Fraternity speaking for the opposing side said " the problem began with the organizations calling themselves greek, i.e. trying to be white." Debate insued with little opportunity for audience intervention. Charles Sheffield, a senior engineering major and member of Phi Beta Sigma fraternity sitting on the Pro side opposite his brother Gee stated " Black greeks have a tradition and a purpose. We shouldn't punish the founders for not knowing what the history of the letters was." David Walker a visiting alumni present at the discussion, said the panelists started off on a point of irrelevancy when they began to debate the title of the discussion with differing viewpoints on whether or not someone could be black and greek at the same time. He said that was not what the students had come to hear.

The audience comprised of about 80 students had come to find out what the fraternities and sororities were about and to hear what they were doing in the community. The question on what greeks are doing for the community was constantly recurring. Richard Gray, a junior and general manager of the Black Mass Communications Project, said, the panelists didn't answer the questions and that the forum was not organized so that the audience could participate. Lucas Wilson, a doctoral student in economics who sat on the opposing side, said that the panel become a forum for each different organization to defend themselves. He accused David Moore another Umass alumni and member of Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity, of bashing his organization because his experience has been less than pleasant and stated that " if his experience had been better he might be sitting on the other side."

The community service issue came to a close after Tony Walker, a senior and memeber of Kappa Alpha Psi who sat on the pro side said, that his fraternity never professed to be a public service organization because they were formed as a support network for college men, although commmunity service is one of their objectives. Lori Edmonds, senior, and member of Delta Sigma Theta Sorority said that many times the general body does not know what the organizations do because the greeks do not look for recognition.

Many members of the audience said that the discussion in the form it took displayed the poorest sense of unity they had ever seen. Kim Holder, a graduate student, wanted to know why it is only in greek forums that people get so nasty when other times these same people are constantly talking about the unity needed within the community. Marc Codling-Davy a freshmen, political science major, said that the constant defense of the individual organizations was making people not want to join and believe in them. As a closing argument, David Walker, said that before the community stands up and chastises the greeks for not doing enough for the public good, they should ask themselves what had they done.

The forum lasted two hours and was held in room 176 in the campus center.

Bolan also reported that he attended the American Legislarive Exchange Council annual conference, but Kimber Messersmith, an official with the conservative group, said the lobbyist's name did not appear on a list of conference attendees.

Bolan's filing lists his attendance at the April 1987 NY Conservative Party Conference and August 1987 Catholic War Veterans(CWV) conference in Florida. New World Theater Presents: Dark Cowgirls and Prairie Queens

Ramani Stripada
Nummo Staff

"Dark Cowgirls and Prairie Queens" is a depiction of seven black women and their confrontations with freedom. To them the West is the promise land and freedom is the dream. Through the narrations by a character named James we learn the tales of these women.

Mary is known for her brutality. She tells an amusing story of the time she was run down by a pack of wolves. She stood there face to face with them until they backed down.

An ex-slave woman is taken to court by her white neighbor for singing. She sings old slave songs very poorly, because they are all she knows. The court says that there is no law against singing, so they offer her singing lessons. The neighbor likes opera, therefore the woman sings the same slave song lyrics in opera.

Edmonia Lewis wants to have some fun with her friends so she adds a little something extra into the wine. The girls get awfully sick and are taken to the doctor's. He diagnoses that they have been poisoned.

Dark Cowgirls and Prarie Queens

Edmonia is accused of poisoning her friends and is appointed a lawyer.

Her lawyer tells her she must prove to the court that she has a worthwhile skill to offer the community. She tells him of her dream to become a sculpturer. He discourages her, but Edmonia remains adament on paying tribute to black heros through sculptures. Once she is freed, Edmonia sculptes those statues and is admired for her fine art work.

Betty Mason is a slave woman who walks from Mississippi to California behind three hundred cattle and wagons. In California one can be free, but a owner can retrieve his runaway slave or he can live there with his slaves. Betty wants her freedom; she is willing to wrestle her master for it. She imagines being free and dreams of a home of her own. Betty tries to gain her freedom, but is thrown into jail with her friends.

There she struggles to keep them thankful for what they have. In the courtroom she speaks of her need to be free. That day her master is sent home minus fourteen slaves. Betty achieves success and is able to build a nursing home.

Julia Boulette is a beautiful woman who wears diamonds and furs. She makes her living being a hooker for the mining men. A common woman approaches her is hopes of a parnership, but Julia refuses the offer. The woman is angered and reminds Julia that she is a common hooker underneath her diamonds and furs. The woman goes on to say that no one will care when Julia dies. Julia claims that when she dies she will be marched to her burial ground. When Julia does die all her diamonds and furs are stolen, but does receive the march to her burial ground.

These are just some of the imaginative stories James tells us. He says that though these tales are not completely true they very well could be. And they are a reminder to him of the struggle his people had and still must go through.

The facts about Mozambique

By Suzette Hunte
Nummo Staff

"Mozambique and the war in Southern Africa", a discussion that took place on Wednesday, October 5th in the second floor lounge of the Gorman dormitory featuring Malics and Sytse Tjellingii, teachers from Mozambique, was a prime example of the old addage, "You can't judge a book by its cover".

When confronted with the sight of this caucasian couple who professed to being Quakers from Holland, I was extremely dissappointed. Where were the brother and sister I expected dressed in the garb of my ancestor's homeland?

I was prepared to hear excerpts from their triumps in sucessfully colonizing and educating the native's of Mozambique out of their heritage and culture with examples of how they rescued the people of Mosambique from certain death. Fortunately, I was wrong.

Between the literature they distributed and the discussion they inspired, the Tjeillingiis imparted as much information as humanly possible in a two hour period.

The couple decided to address the dual topic of Mozambique and the war in South Africa because they felt "The two are as one; one could not exist without the other".

Why?

Mozambique, with a population of 15 million, gained its independence on June 25,1975.

Under the leadership of their late president, Samora Machel, FRELIMO, the all-Black government of Mozambique, was established and proved to be extremely sucessful.

Mozambique under its rule was able to rid herself of forced labor, discrimination, insured freedom of speech, and encouraged large scale participation in political decisions by her people.

Frelimo also made advances in the areas of education, health, and in agriculture.

Today this country is in a state of war due to the exploits of RENAMMO, a South Afrikaan supported anti-government destabilization movement whose sole purpose is to destroy the economic, political, and military institutian's of Mozambique and the other countries neighboring South Africa.

Why?

According to the Tjeillingiis, the South Afrikaans have a vested interest in seeing a weak Mozambique, "A strong Mozambique government would be a good example of how this could work in South Africa and they don't want that so they are trying to destabilize it as much as they can".

And destabilize they have with South Afrika's RENAMO causing an estimated $10 billion in damage to the countries neighboring South Africa between 1980 and 1984 alone.

How does South Africa recruit Black South Africans to fill RENAMO's ranks?

According to Malies Tjeillingii, inside Mozambique many men and children are kidnapped and forced to commit cruelties against their own people. In South Africa, many Mozambicans are picked up by South Afrikaan police and put into prison. Here they are visited by RENAMO officals who drug, blackmail or beat these prisoners until they join RENAMO.

According to the Tjeillingiis, one of the most effective ways of stopping this madness is by sanctions.

Sanctions are actions taken by governments or individuals to express their disapproval, punish, or modify the behavior of another country, most often in the form of economic measures, that impose penalties on other states.

A main argument of the South African government and a common misconception held by some persons of this country, by U.S. corporations, and by the Regan administration, is that Black South Africans would be the first to be hurt by sanctions.

This argument ignores the fact that sanctions will deal a serious blow to the economic well being of affluent white South Afrikaans which can have a significant political effect on the South African Government.

Proponents of this argument concern themselves with the short as opposed to the long term picture. The effects of

You don't have to answer, I can see.

Black Woman! Oh beautiful Black Woman
Are you as tired as you look?
Your body bent, eyes wide and lined
Have your bent, eyes wide and lined
Have your breast the strength for another child to suck?
Have you the nerve for another man to pluck?
You don't have to answer, I can see.

Black Woman! Oh Beautiful Black Woman
Why do you sit there night after night?
Your hands veined, crocked and black
Is it from washing the one dress you wear on your back?
You don't have to answer, I can see.

Black Woman! Oh beautiful Black Woman
Where do you go from here?
Will you just sit in your worn cushioned chair?
Heart heavy, not a soul to care
You don't have to answer, I can see.

The Sounds of South Africa

By Simone Nicholson
Nummo Staff

The place, the Paramount Performing Arts Center in Springfield. The time, 8 p.m. on Friday Sept. 23. The stars, Hugh Masakela and Miriam Makeba. The reaction, OUTSTANDING!

After a retirement of almost twenty years Miriam Makeba is back doing what she knows best, singing the songs of her native South Africa. They say music is best when it comes from the heart, Makeba certainly proves that when she sings the traditional African songs as well as when she plays tribute to those talented musicians who have spent their lives in the townships of South Africa, never being able to show the world their love and creativity.

Masakela, whose narrative of the destructive situations of South Africa silenced the audience, has an even greater talent than his remarkable playing and storytelling; he is a master of arrangement. When he mixes the calypso, reggae, ultimately carribean beats with those of his native country and fuses them all with classic jazz there arrives a style of music that makes the audience understand the motives behind it.

Makeba and Masakela could not have chosen a more perfect time to come back into the spotlight. The rising awareness of South Africa's plight will make their music absolutely essential to furthering the message of the struggle of their people. It is strongly encouraged that anyone with a love for the people and their struggle as well as an appreciation for jazz with a twist, make an effort to listen and learn from Makeba and Masakela.

The staff of Nummo News, the only Black affairs newspaper at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, is pleased to welcome you all to the five college communities of the Pioneer Valley. We hope that you had an enjoyable summer, and are now ready to approach the fall semester with a great deal of enthusiasm resulting in substantial academic progress.

This letter is an appeal to all Black students especially, but not exclusively, from the five local schools of higher education who are interested in communicating their concerns, ideas and needs to other students by contributing to the Nummo News publication in any number of journalistic positions available on the newspaper. Our goal in this effort is to establish a five college network so that Black students from each school can express their views to their Black peers in particular, and to all students from all ethnic origins in general.

Nummo News was founded in 1975, when Black students realized that there was no Black representation on any of the five college newspapers. They protested by staging a sit-in at the UMass Collegian. Their efforts were effective in winning two editorial positions on the publication. This was the conception of the "Black Affairs" page in the Collegian

However, the Black student community did not find the Collegian's endeavors substantial and the following year they established Nummo News. "Nummo," a Swahili word is defined as, "the magic power of the spoken and written word." The early years at Nummo News were most successful. Unfortunately, due to a lack of community support and student commitment, the newspaper has developed more than its share of problems. This year, having identified many of the publication's problems, it is our intention to bring the newspaper back up to the standards of high quality established during the 1970's. One such method is going to be the inclusion of local, national and international news stories and issues relevant to the Black community.

The current staff at Nummo News, although inexperienced (many of us have only been associated with the publication for about one year), is dedicated to bringing the newspaper back to life. It is imperative that the important issues of social conscience are not overlooked or underestimated, but rather, continue to occupy the growing, impressionable young minds of the world. Only then can we hope to change the globe for the better for all peoples!

Therefore, we encourage you to actively participate in the production of Nummo News and help us to establish a five College network, of and for, the Black student community. The Nummo News staff holds meetings every Thursday, 5:15 p.m. in our office at 103 New Africa House on the UMass campus. The telephone number is: 545-0061. If you have any questions feel free to call the office.

Last Wednesdays meeting of the Undergraduate Student Senate yielded unanimous ratifications of the senatorial election results, a report on the outcome of the referandum question and allocation of funds to three student organizations.

After ratifying the election results, the senate asked the results of the referencum question offered with the senate ballots. The question, "Should the police substation in Washington Tower be removed?" received 1,011 "yes" votes and 382 "no" votes. Karen Flanagan, a governmental affairs committee co-chair felt that if the question were read more thoroughly, the student body would have voiced a more unequivocal rejection of the situation.

As the senate was entering a new session, it had to elect new members to the Governmental Affairs committee. Chosen from eleven candidates, Tracy Davis, Todd Lever, Karen Flanagan and John Dunlap emerged as the victors. Their first duty as committee members will be to select two more members to join them on the committee.

On the issue of fund allocations, heavy debate was the order of the day. The proposals made by the finance committee would allocate 1,500 dollars to the Black Mass Communications Project for the upcoming Big Daddy Kane concert, 1,000 dollars to the African-American Stuoent Association for the upcoming Boys Club of Harlem Choir concert, and 2,750 dollars to re-emburse Southwest Area Government for a copier it purchased over the summer. Treasurer Laura Filkins spearheaded a drive to separate the move into two sections; one containing the BMCP and Afro-Am requests and the other containing the Southwest Area Government re-embursement request. When asked why she requested this action, Treasurer Filkins said she took issue with an area government abandoning prodedure, making a financial commitment and then requesting re-embursment. Their opposition led by Jhonathan Grant, claimed that they (SWAG) tried to push their financial request through the senate, but time constraints made it necessary for them to forego procedure by the copier unassisted. After a heated debate, Southwest Area Government received the money it requested but left much animosity on both sides.

Finally, in an attempt to solve the ongoing issue of the presidency Senators Bob Monaghan and Meridith Madison asked to suspend the rules and call for another election. The motion was narrowly defeated and will probably remain a continuing point of debate at future senate meetings.

a short term of suffering pales in comparison to the gains that an eventual overthrow of apartheid could bring.

The Tjeillingii, encourage the students of the University of Massachusetts to get involved.

Said Sytse Tjeillingii, "It would be good if the students of this University could do without coke products", who continues to have the largest share of the South African soft drink industry to date.

"Another thing students can do is contact their senators and tell them to support S-2378. The Dellums/Cranston Bill, for comprehensive economic sanctions against South Africa", said Sytse.

The couple ended their discussion with the sad but true statement, "The struggle continues".

Escaped convict evades detection for 14 years

WALPOLE (AP) — A convicted second-degree murderer who built a model life as a real estate agent after fleeing from Massachusetts to Los Angeles still expresses surprise at his luck in avoiding detention during his 14 years on the run.

"It's really something to think about," said Arthur Bembury. He was returning last week to the state prison in Walpole, the same facility he was sentenced to in 1971.

One of the most unsettling experiences was being fingerprinted for a job he applied for in 1974, Benbury said.

"I had thought I could just go to a shop and have my prints taken but then they just told me I had to go to the Hall of Justice. I was quite nervous," he said.

"You know, going out isn't all that great," Bembury said in an interview published in Tuesday's Boston Globe. "It's just not all it's cracked up to be. You're really still in prison out there because there are a lot of things you can't do."

He was not arrested until a decade later when a tipster led Los Angeles police a few months ago to the Santa Monica, Calif., real estate office where Bembury worked.

Despite thinking that his secret would be revealed, Bembury didn't tell a soul.

He did not tell the woman he lived with for more than a decade, the three children he had with her, the movie producers who cast him in the film "Colors" and a television miniseries, or the police officers who charged him with rape in 1984.

"I had decided in my mind that I was no longer Arthur Bembury. I was Douglas Henare," said Bembury, 37. "You have to become another person if you're going to stay out there.

"The only time you begin to think about it is when you're looking at someone you love and trust, and you wish you didn't feel this hanging over you.

"But it was for their own benefit. If they knew, they might have been charged with harboring a fugitive," Bembury said.

Bembury first entered Walpole in 1971 after being sentenced to life in prison for second-degree murder of Louise Simmons, his girlfriend's mother. He said he made the decision to flee less than four years later because of the high tensions between inmates and guards at the prison.

"I remember when I saw the state police outside one day, I said I am not going to come back if I can help it. I was trying to get away from the system. I wasn't safe. They didn't have control of the system, and a life could be bought for two packs of cigarettes."

He fled on his fifth furlough in 1974 on a bus to Washington. And he made his decision to pursue the kind of social work jobs he wanted, although low-paying jobs might have shielded his identity better.

Bembury got a job certifying children for summer jobs in Washington within a few days. Two years later he flew to Los Angeles and adopted the name of a brother-in-law from New Zealand, Franklin Douglas Henare.

Over the next eight years, Bembury moved into the administration of the American Youth Foundation, a treatment center for abused and neglected children, opened another group home, earned a college degree and pursued his career.

Bembury escaped detection despite being fingerprinted several times and after his arrest on rape charges, officers failed to find his real identity. The rape charge was dismissed.

SGA to vote on motion for closer voting place

By GEORGE FRANCY
Collegian Staff

A proposal for new presidential elections and a call for an amendment to require all Student Government Meetings be open to the public are just two of the 10 motions that could provide some fireworks at tonight's Undergraduate Student Senate meeting.

The call for new elections comes from senators Brian Darling and Ken Rudy. This motion is not the first proposal that would call for new presidential elections. Darling proposed a similar move in the Oct. 5 senate meeting, and Senator Bob Monaghan made an unsuccessful bid last week to stage a new election.

"I think it's about time we got a president. It's been eight months since Shari Silkoff and Jason Rabinowitz got elected illegally," said Rudy. He said under the SGA Constitution co-presidents, such as Silkoff and Rabinowitz are not allowed.

"I think if it were to pass it would be a disaster," Rabinowitz said of the motion. He said students at this point do not want to vote again, and with another election coming up in March, a new president would not have time to get used to the office and be effective.
